Socialism and the Social Movement in the 19th Century

BY

WERNER SOMBART
Professor in the University of Breslau

With a Chronicle of the Social Movement 1750–1896

"Je ne propose rien, je ne suppose rien: j'expose"

TRANSLATED BY

ANSON P. ATTERBURY
Pastor of the Park Presbyterian Church
New York

WITH INTRODUCTION BY

JOHN B. CLARK
Professor of Political Economy
Columbia University

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

NEW YORK   LONDON
27 WEST TWENTY-THIRD STREET   24 REDFORD STREET, STRAND
The Knickerbocker Press
1898 COPYRIGHT, 1898
BY
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
Entered at Stationers' Hall, London
TO THE OTHER AND BETTER MEMBER OF THE COMMUNISTIC SOCIETY TO WHICH WE BELONG
THIS TRANSLATION IS INSCRIBED
PREFACE, BY THE TRANSLATOR

WHILE rambling through quaint old Nuremberg, last summer, I was driven for shelter from rain into a bookshop. In a conversation with the genial proprietor, he called my attention to a book, lately published, that had already made a deep impression upon the world of German readers. A reading and re-reading of the little book convinced me that English readers, as well, will be glad to follow Professor Sombart in his comprehensive and suggestive review of Socialism.

Thanks are due to the learned German professor, whose name appears on the title-page, for his courtesy in this matter; also to his German publisher. I would also express obligation to my friend, Professor Sigmon M. Stern, with whom I have consulted freely on some difficult points of translation. The Introduction by Professor John B. Clark, of Columbia University, will be appreciated, I know, by the reader as well as by myself.

A. P. A.

April, 1898.
INTRODUCTORY NOTE

THE reader of this work will miss something which he has been accustomed to find in books on Socialism. Professor Sombart has not given us synopses of the theories of St. Simon, Proudhon, Marx, Owen, and others. His work marks the coming of a period in which socialism is to be studied, rather than the speculations of socialists. Theories and plans no longer constitute the movement. There are still schools of socialistic thought; but there is something actually taking place in the industrial world that is the important part of the socialistic movement. Reality is the essence of it.

The structure of the world of industry is changing. Great establishments are exterminating small ones, and are forming federations with each other. Machinery is producing Introductory Note

very kind of goods, and there is no place in the world for such a middle was represented by the master work- shop his slowly learned handicraft and his These facts construed in a cerare the material of socialism. If we tem the dawn of an era of state indus- shall sweep competition and competiition of the field, we are evolutionary-y may need a doctrinal basis for our view evolution that is going on; and we may in the works of Marx and others; but we have ceased to have an absorbing tern. Marxism, in practice, means realism and a reliance on evolution, however little the wilder utterances of Marx himself may suggest that fact. Internationalism is also a trait of this modern movement; but it is not of the kind that is represented by the International Working-Men's Association. It is a natural affiliation of men of all nations having common ends to gain.
Introductory Note

The relation of a thinker to a practical movement cannot lose its importance. It is this connection that Professor Sombart gives us, and his work is an early representative of the coming type of books on Socialism. It treats of realities, and of thought that connects itself with realities. It treats, indeed, of a purposeful movement to assist evolution, and to help to put the world into the shape that socialistic theorists have defined. Here lies the importance of the study of theory.

Professor Sombart's work contains little that is directly controversial; but it gives the impression that the purpose of the socialists is based on a fallacy, that it is not, in reality, in harmony with evolution, and that it will not prevail. It may be added that the style of the work is worthy of the thought that it expresses,
g the more valuable of the works

ism that have thus far appeared.

John B. Clark,
Columbia University, New York
PREFACE

WHAT is here published was originally delivered in the form of lectures, in the Fall of 1896, in Zurich, before miscellaneous but in general appreciative and inspiring audiences. The approval which they received, and the earnestly expressed wish of many hearers that the addresses might appear in print, have finally overcome a not inconsiderable reluctance on my part, felt by all in like position. The lectures are in many places enlarged; indeed, largely put into new form—changed from extemporaneous utterance into the more formal style proper for the written word. But their character remains, especially the restricted setting into which a great mass of material had to be compressed. This is done intentionally, since what I would offer to a larger public through this book is a brief, pointed, well-defined view of “Socialism and the Social Movement in the Nineteenth Century.”

W. S.
CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Translator's Preface</td>
<td>v</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introductory Note by Professor John B. Clark</td>
<td>viii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author's Preface</td>
<td>ix</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

##CHAPTER

I. Whence and Whither                                  | 1    |
  Class struggle—Kant—The meaning of the social movement—Essential elements in every social movement—Characterisation of the social movement—Conditions under which the working class lives—Russian peasants—Irish "rack-rent" tenants—Uncertainty of existence—The Japanese—The Kurd—Hegel—The ground of revolutionary passions in the modern proletariat—Time environment of the modern social movement—"Revolutionism."

II. Concerning Utopian Socialism                       | 19   |
Contents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>THE ANTECEDENTS OF THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT</th>
<th>PAGE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

| THE DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONAL PECULIARITIES | 62 |
| Characterisation of the English working-men's movement — English industrial monopoly, 1850–1880 — Alternation of power between Tories and Whigs — Value of legislation in favour of the working man — Temperament of the English working-man — Practical tendency of the old English trade-union — English |
Contents

XI

CHAPTER VI. THE TREND TOWARDS UNITY . . . . . 121

CHAPTER VII. TENDENCIES OF THE PRESENT . . . . 142

Contradiction apparent in the great social movement—Sources from which contradictions spring—Political influence of the social movement—Revolutionism a manifestation of unripeness—Meaning of social evolution—Theoretical and practical social development—Confusion of "ideal" and "programme"—Relation of the proletariat to the demos—The social movement to be the representative of the highest form of economic life at every period of production upon the largest scale—The "agrarian question"—The Marxian theory of development only for the sphere of manufactures—Does not apply to agricultural development—Anti-religious nature of the proletarian movement—The grounds for this enmity to religion—The movement anti-ecclesiastical—Patriotism—Not the heritage of a particular class—Nationalism—Feeling of nationalism not shared by the proletariat—No reason in the essence of modern socialism for anti-nationalism—Asiatic development—Advance ment of Japan—Attitude of America towards Asiatic development.
Contents

Chronicle of the Social Movement (1750-1848)...

- Inventions of modern machinery—"Machine
- Laws for the protection of machines—Adam
- Robert Owen's chief writings—Fourier's first great book—Complete rev
- "Salah" arrives at Liverpool—Chief work of St.
- More liberal coalition law—Opening of the
- Insurrection of the workers in Lyons—Beginning of specific legis-Contents

SOCIALISM
AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT IN THE XIXTH CENTURY

CHAPTER I
WHENCE AND WHITHER

"Da ist's denn wieder, wie die Sterne wollten:
Bedingung und Gesetz; und aller Wille
Ist nur ein Wollen, weil wir eben sollten, Und vor dem Willen schweigt die Willkür stille."

Goethe, Urworte.

WHEN Karl Marx began a communistic manifesto with the well-known words, "The history of all society thus far is the history of class strife," he uttered, in my opinion, one of the greatest truths that fill our century. But he did not speak the whole truth. For it is not fully true that all history of society consists exclusively in struggle between classes. If we would put "world history" into a single phrase we shall be obliged, I think, to say that
Socialism

There is an antithesis around which the whole story of society turns, as around two poles: social and national—using the word national in the widest meaning. Humanity develops itself into communities, and then these communities fight and compete with each other; always within the community the individual begins to strive for elevation over others, in order, as Kant once expressed it, to make distinction of rank among his fellows, from whom he does not like, from whom, however, he cannot escape. So we see on the one side exertion of the community for wealth, power, recognition; and on the other side the Whence and Whither

cial contrasts; and the varying views, world-wide in their differences, which obtain day by day in different groups of men, all lead back, as it seems to me, to the alternative, "national or social."

Before I now proceed with my theme, "Socialism and the Social Movement in the Nineteenth Century,"—that is, to one member of this antithesis, the social,—I would first suggest the question: "What is a social movement?"
I answer: By a social movement we understand the aggregate of all those endeavours of a social class which are directed to a rational overture of an existing social order to suit the interests of this class. The essential elements in every social movement are these: First, an existing order in which a certain society lives, and particularly a social order which rests chiefly upon the manner of production and distribution of material goods as the necessary basis of human existence. This specific system of production and distribution is the point of issue for every social movement. Secondly, a social class which is discontented with the existing conditions. By a "social class" I understand a number of similarly interested persons, especially persons who are similarly clic system of production and distribution must, in understanding any social question, take account of this economic system; and we must not allow ourselves to be blinded or misled by the inbred notions of certain classes.

Possessions, which frequently constitute the bulwarks of classes differing economically, are merely means to an end, namely, an aim which this class, in its struggle with the existing order of things, seeks to reach; an ideal, which presents an outline of all that for which the society as a whole stands, and which finds its expression in manifestos, sigs, satiric burlesques, pamphlets, demands, programmes of the most general kind, where you can speak of a movement you find a point of issue, the point of departure, a supporter of the movement; a supporter of the movement; a supporter of the movement is a supporter of the movement; an aim, the ideal of society.

In what follows I shall attempt to give a short survey of the political, economic, social movements of the modern epoch—collective and individual—of the modern epoch—social movement. It out of which, of necessity, that is produced which we describe as a social movement. That is, to comprehend why specific social classes are formed, why they present these particular points of opposition, why especially a pushing, aggressive social class has, and must have, that particular ideal for which it reaches. We mean, above all, to see that the movement springs not out of the whim, the choice, the malevolence of individuals; that it is not made, but becomes.

And now to the modern social movement. How is it to be characterised? If we would hold fast to those elements which constitute every social movement, we must describe the modern social movement on two sides: according to its aim, and according to the class that supports the movement. The modern social movement is, from the standpoint of its aim, a socialistic agitation, because, as will be shown, it is uniformly directed to the establishment of communal ownership, at least of the means of production; that is, to a socialistic, communal order of society in place of the existing method of private ownership. It is characterised, on the other side, in accordance with the adherents of the movement, by the fact that it is a prole-initiative, is the proletariat, a class of workers.

And now we ask the question: Is it possible to distinguish those circumstances which make such a movement evidently a necessary development? I said that the movement has, as its supporters, the proletariat, a class of free, lifelong workers. The first condition of its existence is the rise of this class itself. Every movement is the result, the expression, of some form of production; the proletarian form of production which we are accustomed to call capitalistic. The history of the proletariat is also the history of capitalism. This latter cannot exist, it cannot develop, without producing the proletariat. It is now my purpose to give to you a survey of capitalism. Only this much may be said for the understanding of its naturalistic system of production involv and means of production, as machines, tools, establishments, raw material, etc.—the capitalistic class; the other class is that of the personal factors of production, the possessors only of workman's craft—the free wage-workers. If we realise that all production rests upon the union of the material and the personal factors of production, then the capitalistic system of production distinguishes itself from others in that both the factors of production are represented through two socially separated classes which must necessarily come together by free consent, the "free wage compact," so that the processes of production may take place. The method of production thus formed has entered into history as a necessity. It arose in that moment when demand had become so strong that the earlier methods of production could not longer satisfy the enlarging conditions, in the time when new and large markets were opened. It appeared originally solely with the historic task of implanting the mercantile spirit of manufacture for the maintaining of these new markets. The mercantile talent forces itself on as leader of production and draws great masses of mere hand-workers into its service. It then becomes yet more of a ne-
Socialism

It is as the development of the technique of production complicates the whole operation so drastically that the combination of many kinds of work in one product is unavoidable; especially the introduction of steam for the production and transportation of goods. The supporters of the capitalistic method of production are, as a class, the bourgeoisie, the middle class. How gladly would I speak of a great historic mission which this class has fulfilled! But again I must content myself with this mere reference, that we see this historic mission in the wonderful development with which this class has given to the material forces supporter of the modern socialistic movement —the proletariat. I have already said that the proletariat follows the capitalistic form of production as its shadow. This scheme of production cannot exist otherwise, cannot develop itself otherwise, than under the condition that, subject to the command of individuals, troops of possessionless workers are herded in great undertakings. It has as a necessary presupposition the rending of all society into two classes: the owners of the means of production, and the personal factors in production. Thus the existence of capitalism is the necessary preliminary condition of the proletariat, and so of the modern social movement.
Whence and Whither

But how stands it with the proletariat? What are the conditions under which the working-class lives? And how has it come to pass that out of these conditions those particular tendencies and demands have arisen which, as we shall find, have come out of this proletariat? Usually, when one is asked concerning the characteristics of the modern proletariat, the first answer is—the great misery in which the masses are sunk. That may pass with some qualification; only it must not be forgotten that misery is not specifically confined to the modern proletariat. Thus, how miserable is the condition of the peasants in Russia, of the in "rack-rent" tenants! There must be a specific kind of misery which characterises the proletariat. I refer, here, particularly to those healthy work-places, mines, manufactories and their noise and dust and heat, that have been with the modern method of production; and think of the conditions produced by these methods of production which tend to draw in the work certain categories of workers,—as men and children; I think further of how concentration of population in industrial centres and in the great cities has increased the Whence and Whither
Socialism

which the workman passes as he goes on his way to his manufactory or workshop in the dreary part of the city; it is the contrast in condition which develops hate in the masses. And that, again, is a peculiarity of the modern system, that it develops this hate and permits hate to become envy. It seems to me that this happens principally for the reason that those who display this grandeur are no longer the churches or the princes; but that they are those very persons on whom the masses feel themselves dependent, in whose direct economic control they see themselves, in whom they recognise their so-called "exploiters." This definite modern contrast is that which principally excites the intensity of this feeling of hate in the masses. Yet one thing further. It is not merely the miserable condition, the contrast with the well-to-do; but another terrible whip is swung over the heads of the proletariat—I mean the uncertainty in their lives. Also in this we have to do with a peculiarity of modern social life, if we rightly understand it. Uncertainty of existence is indeed elsewhere: the Japanese trembles at the thought of the earthquake that may at any moment overwhelm him and his possessions; the Kurd
Socialism

Afraid of the sand-storm in summer, of the snow-storm in winter, which blight the feeding-time for his flocks; a flood or drought in Asia may rob the peasant of his harvest and expose him to starvation. But what constitutes the specific uncertainty of the proletariat, which expresses itself in the loss of wage and work, is this, that this uncertainty is understood as a result not of the natural causes of which I have spoken, but of the specific form of organisation of economic life—that is the chief point. "Against nature no man can assert a right; but in the constitution of society lack comes immediately a form of injustice done, of this wretchedness with the glitter of the bread-masters, the uncertainty of existence, supposed to arise out of the forms of organisation of economic life.

In order now to be able to understand how these growths have pressed forward into the peculiar manifestations which characterise the modern social movement, we must realise that the masses which we have learned to know in the position thus described have been developed as if by magic, have not slowly grown into this condition. It is as if earlier history had been completely effaced for millions of men. For, as the presupposition of capitalism is combination in large operations, there is involved in this also the accumulation of masses of men in cities and centres of industry. This massing, however, means nothing other than this, that completely incoherent, amorphous crowds of men out of the most widely separated regions of the land are thrown together at one point, and that upon them the demand is made "Live!" This involves a complete break with the past, a tearing apart of all ties of home, village, family, custom. It means as well the overthrow of all the earlier ideals of these homeless, possession-and coherrentless masses. This is a matter which is often underestimated. We forget it is an entirely new life which the hordes of the modern proletariat have to begin. But what kind of a life is it? In its characteristics and as many points of explanation for the negative construction of the proletarian world ideas as for the destruction of all that has heretofore been dear and precious to man. In some, the socialistic ideals of communal life work must of necessity spring out of the industrial centres and the resorts of the workmen in the great cities. In the tenements, the huge manufactories, the public the outcast finds himself again treated as a man. The individual disappears, the companion emerges. A uniform class consciousness matures itself, also the habit of communal work and pleasure. So much for the psychology of the proletariat.
Socialism

In order now to gain a full understanding of the modern social movement, let us look at its general time environment. Also here merely a remark or two must suffice. Perhaps this phrase will sufficiently describe the modern period: there is in it conspicuously an exuberance of life, as I think in no earlier period. A stream of vigorous life flows through modern society as at no earlier time; and for this reason a quickness of contact between all the individual members of a society is made possible now as never heretofore. This has been accomplished by the modern means of transportation which capitalism has created for us. The possibility in these days of informing oneself in a few hours concerning the occurrences throughout a great country by means of telegraph, telephone, newspaper, and the possibility of throwing great masses of men from one place to another by modern means of transportation, have produced a con-
Socialism

...
are in such a process of change that we are impelled to the delusion that there is nothing now certain. And this is perhaps one of the most important considerations for the explanation of the real meaning of modern social agitation. It explains in two ways. In it we see the reason for that destructive criticism of all that exists, which allows nothing as good, which throws away all earlier faith as old iron in order to enter with new material upon the market. Also, it explains the fanatical belief in the feasibility of the desired future state. Since so much has already changed, since such wonders, for which no one has dared to hope, have been realised before our very eyes, why not more? Why not all that man wishes? Thus the revolutionism of the present becomes fertile soil for the Utopia of the future. Edison and Siemens are the spiritual fathers of Bellamy and Bebel.

These seem to me the essential conditions under which a social movement has developed itself in this later time: the peculiar existence of the proletariat; the specific misery, contrast, uncertainty, springing from the modern economic system; a reorganisation of all forms of life, through the tearing apart of and of new consolidations in the g and operations; finally, the peculiar the time in which the social move hibits itself, intensity of life, nervos utionism.

Now let us consider this social i itself, in theory and practice.
CHAPTER II

CONCERNING UTOPIAN SOCIALISM

"Rarely do we reach truth except through extremes—we must have foolishness . . . even to exhaustion, before we arrive at the beautiful goal of calm wisdom."

SCHILLER, Philosophical Letters, Preamble.

It would be strange if such a mighty revolution in economic and social matters as I have sketched for you should not have found its reflection in the minds of thinking men. It would be wonderful, I think, if with this overturning of social institutions a revolution of social thought, science, and faith should not follow. We find in fact that parallel with this revolution in life fundamental changes have taken place in the sphere of social thought. By the side of the old social literature a new set of writings arises. The former belongs to the end of the previous and the beginning of the present century; it is that which we are accustomed to call the classic political economy; it is that which, after a development of about the capitalistic economic system that great political economists Adam S. Smith and David Ricardo. By the side of this, devoted to the capitalistic view of economy, now grows a new school of writings, with this general characteristic, that it is anti-capitalistic; that is, it places itself in opposition to the capitalistic school of thought and considers the advocacy of this view as its peculiar task.

In accordance with the undeveloped nature of such economic thought it is, of course, a medley of explanations and claims about what is and what should be, wherein the process of literature expresses its opposition. All undeveloped literature begins in this tumultuous sea of ideas and unschooled minds at first slowly distinguish between what is and what should be. And indeed in the immaturity of undeveloped literature the practical element prevails greatly, as may readily be understood.
Concerning Utopian Socialism

nuances (delicate differences), it will be convenient to choose as distinguishing marks the differing uses of the new "Thou shalt." Thus we recognise in general two groups in this new literature, the reformatory and the revolutionary. The latter word is not used in its ordinary meaning, but in that which I shall immediately define. The reformatory and the revolutionary literature divide on this point, that the reformatory recognises in principle the existing economic system of capitalism, and attempts upon the basis of this economy to introduce changes and improvements, which are, however, subordinate, incidental, not essential; also, and especially, that the fundamental features of social order are retained, but that man desires to see his fellow-man changed in thought and feeling. A new spirit obtains, repentance is proclaimed, the good qualities of human nature win the upper hand—brotherly love, charity, conciliation.

This reformatory agitation that recognises the injury and evil of social life, but that with essential adhesion to the dominant economic system desires to mitigate the injury and to overcome or minimise the evil, has different ways of expression. It is a Christian, or an
Socialism

...cal, or a philanthropic impulse which calls in the new literature and controls the things that make for social reform.

The Christian thought is that which, in application to the social world, creates that trend of literature which we are accustomed incorrectly to designate under the phrase “Christian Socialism.” Of this are the writings of Lamennais in France, Kingsley in England, which, filled with the spirit of the Bible, address to employer and employe alike the demand—Out with the spirit of mammon from your souls, your hearts with the spirit of the gospel, “new spirit,” as they constantly call it.
Concerning Utopian Socialism

would overwhelm the misery which they see by this universal love of man. "Love one another as men, as brothers!" is the theme of their preaching. All these three streams of thought, merely the sources of which I have specified, continue influential to the present day; and all of them have this in common, that they hold fast in principle to the foundations of the existing social order—therefore I call them reformatory. Opposed to them appears another class of literature, the "revolutionary"; so called because its great principle is the doing away with the foundations of capitalistic economy, and the substituting something different. This it proposes to do in two different ways,—if I may express my meaning in two words,—backwards and forwards.

At the very time when economic contradictions develop themselves and new phases of anti-capitalistic literature come to the surface, we find a revolutionary anti-capitalistic literature strongly asserting itself, which demands a retrogression from the existing system of economics. Such are the writings of Adam Müller and Leopold von Haller in the first third of our century, men who would change the bases on which the modern capitalistic econ-t-end. These are indeed manifest have not as yet reached their end.

Besides these reactionary movements, there is another movement which wants this regression to old forms. The same way demands an overthrow of the existing capitalistic system; this change must be under the modern advanced ideas which on the technical side, betoken that the changes are accustomed to call “progress.” That is, theories, they are which hold the historic essence of capitalistic method—-that it is built upon the modern production in the mass; under the influence of advanced ideas a new order of production and disposition of the interests of those classes of which under the capitalistic economic come short—thus essentially in the tion on a large scale, are the ones whom we must call socialists in the true meaning of the word. And we have now to do with a strange species of these socialists, with those whom we are accustomed to call utopists or utopian socialists. The typical representatives of these utopian socialists are St. Simon and Charles Fourier in France, and Robert Owen in England. Of these, the most conspicuous are the two Frenchmen; their systems are most frequently presented. Owen is less known. As I now attempt to make clear to you, through him, the essence of utopian socialism, it is because he is less known, but especially because in my opinion he is the most interesting of the three great utopists. It is he who on the one side most clearly shows to us the genesis of the modern proletarian ideal, and on the other side has been of greatest influence upon other socialistic theorists, especially upon Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels.
Concerning Utopian Socialism

Robert Owen was a manufacturer. We find him at the age of twenty years already the manager of a great cotton-mill. Soon after he established a mill at Lanark. Here he learned practical life by personal experience. We distinguish two periods in his life. In the first he ...and expects through a reformation of human society. The work of this epoch is the book of Society. In the second period, socialists; and his most important work is the book of the New Moral World. What does he thus teach? And the essence of this first form of utopia?

Robert Owen takes as the starting-point his theorising the investigations made in his immediate surroundings. Societies to us the state of affairs in which he saw them with his own manufactories; how, especially the women and children, are physically, intellectually and morally grooms also with a recognition of the starting-point is proletarian. Upon investigations of his own he now built a philosophic system which is not one which...
Concerning Utopian Socialism

order of communal life which would in like manner be naturally good if only these men were brought into proper relations with each other—faith in the so-called ordre naturel, in a natural order of things which has possibly existed somewhere, but which in any case would exist, were it not that artificial hindrances stand in the way, evils which make it impossible for man to live in this natural way with others. These evils, these forces, which stand in the way of the accomplishment of a natural communal life, Robert Owen sees of two kinds: one in the faulty education of men, the other in the defective environment in which modern man lives—the evils of a rich milieu. He infers logically, if we would again realise that natural and beautiful condition of harmonious communal life, that ordre naturel, both these evils must be driven out of the world. He demands, therefore, better education on the one side, a better environment upon the other. In these two postulates we find side by side the two periods of his development as we have heretofore seen them. In the first he lays stress rather upon education; in the second, rather upon change of environment. He recognises, further—and this is perhaps the of which all depend been provided by nature, but have definite system of social order believes to be the capitalistic. In the economy he sees nothing of that which the representatives of the econoies assert; but an order of so by man. Even his opponents be ordre naturel, only they thought realised; Owen did not. Much was compelled to demand the or this economic system in order that might be reached, that man might to enjoy a better development an environment. For this reason he that the artificial economic sys undergo essential changes, espe-ponts, the main pillars upon whi nomic system is built. Owen rep competition of the individual and making of the master.
\[end of text\]
Concerning Utopian Socialism

operation will be replaced by communal production, and competition will be in fact overthrown; also, the profit of the employer will flow into the pockets of the producers, the members of the social organisation. These ideas of socialistic production grew, for Owen, spontaneously out of the capitalistic system in which he lived.

Here we come directly to the attitude of spirit in which Robert Owen has conceived his socialistic system, and it is necessary for the completion of this sketch to make reference especially to the means which Owen would use to reach his goal. These means are essentially a universal understanding and agreement among men; to them the truth and beauty of this new order should be preached, so that the wish may be aroused in them to accomplish this new order. But Owen does not think of the possibility that, when it is once made clear how wonderfully this new order would be and how wonderfully men would live therein, men would not wish for the new order, and even if they did wish for it, that they might not be able to accomplish it. Only let the matter be known, then the wish and the ability will follow. For this reason, it is possible that the can come over the world. Only perception is necessary, and this the mind of man suddenly as a light.
This peculiar conception of the ways that lead to the goal is one characteristic traits which distinguish of Owen, and in like manner of socialists.

If we look at this system as a whole as the starting-point a criticism of social circumstances in a proletariat nity. We find, further, as the which the system stands, the social demands, the overthrow of the economy and the replacing of priv tion by communal operation. We as the means for accomplishing the roadway that leads to the object of enlightenment of mankind. How erted himself to carry out his plan.
Concerning Utopian Socialism

ing of the hours of labor and in the limitation of work by women and children, through improvement and amelioration of work in his manufactories, in which a new race began to rise in intellectual and moral freshness. Just so little are we interested in the fact that he is the father of English trade-union agitation. We would only look at his significance for the social movement, and this lies especially in the fact that he first, at least in outline, created that which since has become the proletarian ideal. For this point must be made clear to us, that all the germs of later socialism are contained in Owen's system.

If I now, after having sketched the fundamental ideas of Owen's system, may attempt to condense the essence of the so-called utopian socialism into a few sentences, I would specify this as essential: Owen and the others are primarily socialists because their starting-point is proletarian criticism. They draw this immediately out of spheres in which capitalism asserts itself, out of the manufactory as Owen, out of the counting-house as Fourier. They are, further, socialists for this reason, not only that their starting-point is proletarian, but also because their object is socialistic in the sense
It is no longer proper operation and the sharing of the power of the master and workman, but is based on communal effort, without competition between employer and employee. But why, we ask of them, are they called socialistic utopists? Are they to be distinguished from those whom we shall learn to call scientists? Owen, St. Simon, and Fourier are called utopists for the reason that they recognise the real factors of society. They are the true and legitimate children of the na"ïve and idealistic eighteenth century. We, with right, call the century of enlightenment.

I have already showed to you how, in the power of knowledge of good, predominates in Owen's work. In this lies essentially its utopianism: those are looked upon as effective agents of society, factors which do not in fact constitute its social life.
Concerning Utopian Socialism

followers assume that the present order of things is nothing other than a mistake, that only for this reason men find themselves in their present position, that misery rules in the world only because man has not known thus far how to make it better—that is false. The utopists fail to see, in their optimism, that a part of this society looks upon the status quo as thoroughly satisfactory and desires no change, that this part also has an interest in sustaining it, and that a specific condition of society always obtains because those persons who are interested in it have the power to sustain it. All social order is nothing other than the temporary expression of a balance of power between the various classes of society. Now judge for yourselves what mistaken estimate of the true world, what boundless underestimate of opposing forces, lie in the belief that those who have power can be moved to a surrender of their position through preaching and promise.

As the utopists underestimate the power of their opponents, so they overestimate their own strength, and thus become utopists as to the future. They are pervaded by the strong conviction that there is needed only an energetic, hearty resolution in order to bring to reality
Socialism

dom of the future. They rate too the ability of the men who will consti- future society. They forget, or they now, that in a long process of recom men and things must first be created to make the new social order pos-

The practical working of the social movemost interesting conclusion which the draw logically out of this conception of tactics which they recommend for the new condition. From what has it follows necessarily that this strategy minate in an appeal to men collectively.
Concerning Utopian Socialism

for the erection of the first phalanstery. No one came.

In closest connection with this belief in the willingness of the ruling classes to make concessions stands the disinclination to all use of force, to all demand and command. Thus we find, as the simple thought in the tactics of the utopists, the repudiation of class strife and political effort. For how can this be brought into harmony with their main idea? How can anything that is to be accomplished by intellectual illumination, or at most by example, be achieved through strife? It is unthinkable. So, just as utopian socialism rejects political exertion, it also stands opposed to all those efforts which we are accustomed to call the economic agitation of the workman, such as trade-unions and the like. It is the same thought: how shall the organisation of working-men for strife tend to the improvement of the condition of work, when this can come only through the preaching of the new gospel? Robert Owen indeed organised in England trade-unions. But their work was really the propagation of his socialistic theories, not painful struggle against capitalism. Rejection of class strife in the sphere of politics as of
Socialism

The agitation, repudiation of this in speech and example—herein culminate the dream of the utopian socialists. This, as I have attempted to show to you, is the necessary outcome of their system, built upon beautiful idealized lines.

I now take leave of utopian socialism. Let us guard ourselves from the thought that the spirit of this great historic influence has disappeared from the world. No! no day without the reappearance, in some book, essay, of these fundamental thoughts which have been recognised as the essence of utopianism. Especially in the circles of the well
CHAPTER III

THE ANTECEDENTS OF THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT

"The great, dumb, deep-buried class lies like an Enceladus, who in his pain, if he will complain of it, has to produce earthquakes."—THOMAS CARLYLE, "Charism." ix. (Essays. Edition, Chapman and Hall, vi., 169).

THE question which now rests upon the lips of you all, since I have indicated the lines of thought of the first socialists, is this: When such noble minds drew the plan of a new and better world for their suffering brethren, where was the proletariat itself, and what did it do? What are the beginnings of the social movement which is carried on by the masses?

The answer must be that long, very long, after much had been thought and written concerning the condition and future of the proletariat this element of the population yet remained completely untouched by these new ideas, knew nothing of them, cared nothing for them; it permitted itself to be controlled by other forces, other motives. The systems of St. Simon, Fourier, Owen, have had little or no influence with the masses.
Socialism

If we turn to the proletariat itself and ask, perhaps up to the middle of our — we find a precursor of the social resented by the capitalistic economy—and is uniformly the same marks and is uniformly ed in the following way: where the not the masses, stands out clearly and of its aim, it is not proletarian; where etarian, it is not clear and conscious of That means, in the conscious move-which the proletariat is engaged, ass elements direct as to the object where the proletariat undertakes to Antecedents

the battles of the middle classes, like the common soldiers who fought in feudal armies. This fact, that we here have to do with purely middle-class movements, has so often been mistaken by many celebrated historians, the terms "communism" and "socialism" have been so constantly applied to those agitations, that it is well worth our while to show the incorrectness of this assumption. For this purpose, we must look separately at those movements which are connected with the years thus specified, since each one has its own characteristics.

If we present to ourselves first the real meaning of the movements of 1789 and 1793, the great French Revolution, it is clear even to those of limited vision that the revolution of 1789 was purely a middle-class movement, and indeed carried on by the higher part of the middle class. It is the struggle of the upper middle-class for the recognition of its rights, and for relief from the privileges of the ruling class of society—from the fetters in which it had been held by feudal powers. It expresses this struggle in demands for equality and freedom, but it really means from the very start a limited equality and freedom. Look at the first, trenchant, we may call them social, which were passed by the new regime of 1789. They are by no means of a popular or partial to the working-man; we are the first look that they were not made for the masses, but by an aristocratic middle-class, which places itself in sharp contrast to the rabble. Thus the well-known insurrection of October 19, 1789, a riot act, to this distinction as it speaks "contrs citoyens" who must be protected by police regulation against the attacks of "mob"; "when the mob disperse on warning, then the armed shall fire." They would so control the freedom of thought and expression.
Socialism

Antecedents

year. This applies equally to the employer and the working-man, we may better say the master and the journeyman; but we all know what crying injustice this equality has produced.

Then comes the first consolidation of the new society, the Constitution of November 3, 1791, which, through the introduction of limited franchise, brings to sharp and clear expression the separation between a ruling class of those well-to-do and a ruled class of the "have-nothings." There are now "full citizens" and citizens of the second class.

Thus it is clear that the revolution of 1789 was not at all a proletarian movement. There may seem to be some doubt concerning the agitation of 1793, for it is this, before all others, which our great historians, as Sybel, like to specify as "communistic." The men of Montaigne are, in their eyes, the predecessors of the social democracy; and, indeed, quite lately in a small book published by the Berlin Professor H. Delbrueck in the Goettingen library for working-men, exactly this assertion is presented—that the leaders of this social movement were true social democrats, and that in fact the social democracy has developed no thoughts since Saint Just and Robespierre. I cannot recognise this assertion as
Socialism

Let us test it.

but that even the movement of 1793 was essentially non-proletarian. We grant that an undercurrent of democracy breaks through the French Revolution always existed there from the beginning. It existed already in 1789, in the elections to the States-General, and comes finally in its full development.

You read through the Cahiers with their lists of the year 1789, those "papers of ployment, the overthrow of Sunday rest and of feast-days. Everyone knows how this cry arises again and again in the speeches and writings of Marat. The Ami du Peuple declaims against the “aristocrats,” and desires to serve the “people.” They found out that, for the great masses of the “poor,” freedom and equality availed nothing; and Marat thus concludes: “Equality of rights leads to equality of enjoyment, and only upon this basis can the idea rest quietly.” Then come the taxes; the “maximum” comes. But I ask you, does that make this movement a proletarian and social one? Can it be that at all? Let us look merely at its supporters! The chief centres of democratic undercurrent are, as has been said, Lyons and Paris. In Lyons we find, indeed, a proletariat, that of the silk industry. We have the statistics of the year 1789; at that time there were, in the Lyons silk industry, 410 mattres marchands fabricants, 4402 mattres ouvriers, 1796 compagnons, and about 40,000 other workers of both sexes. We must allow that here, without doubt, there are indeed strong proletarian interests and instincts; yet they are veiled by the peculiar character of the Lyons silk industry. It had
Socialism

Time, and has even to-day, a strong hold on the lower middle-class, and to a degree the upper middle-class, for two reasons. Due to its peculiar organisation, the fact that the work was not carried on in large factories but in small workshops under the control of independent masters, and that created a class of independent men, between the capitalist and the worker, hard to concerted action with the proletariat. And reason is this, that the Lyons silk industry is a manufacture of an article of luxury; such industries are in their very nature, the earlier times, anti-revolutionary;
Antecedents

they yet belonged. The real mass of the Sans-culottes was not made out of wage-workers. It was rather the Parisian lower middle-class; it was, first, the guild-excluded master mechanics who dwelt in the Faubourg St. Antoine and Du Temple; secondly, the journey-men; thirdly, that element which the French call la boutique, retailers, tavern-keepers, etc., an important category. These, then, are the great hordes who clustered around Danton, Robespierre, and Marat. And what of these leaders themselves? Of what spirit are they children? They are, essentially, of the lower middle-class by birth. They are extreme radicals, extreme individualists. They are in their ideals and aims entirely unsocial and unproletarian according to our ideas to-day. The Constitution of 1793, in Article II., proclaims as Droits de l'Homme: Egalité, Liberté, Sûreté, Propriété. That is not proletarian and is not socialistic; thus all the assertions of a communistic movement at that time are thrown out. I have dwelt thus long on this revolution of 1793 in order to show how premature it is to speak of social democrats and of a social or proletarian movement wherever there is any outcry and disturbance.
Socialism

...but briefly touch upon other moves in this early history. The insurrection of 1796, bore certainly the communist mp; but, as we now know, it was with a response from the masses, who were tired of revolution.

Evidently of the upper middle-class were the revolution of 1830 in France and the revolution of 1848 in Germany. In both cases citizenship in strife with feudal forces. The early appears the civic character of the revolution of 1832 in England, and of the February revolution of 1848 in France, because the revolts were directed against forms of government sustained by citizens themselves. These movements, of 1832 in England...
Antecedents

behind all the barricades from 1789 to 1848 lie proletarian bodies; but of all those movements of which I have thus told you, not a single one is proletarian, or in our sense a social movement. Where now the proletariat fights for itself and represents its own interests we discern at first mere muttered, inarticulate sounds; and it takes long for these tones to rise to cries, for these cries to grow to general demands, and to become crystallised into programmes. The first proletarian agitations—movements of the unhappy, deeply buried mass—are, according to Carlyle's word, like the movements of Enceladus, who as he quivers in his pain causes an earthquake. These are movements of an entirely instinctive kind, claiming that which lies next, and attacking that which seems to them evidently to stand in the way. These are deeds which originally and largely assume the form of robbery and plunder. They have as their object to injure in some way the enemy in his power of possession. In England towards the close of the preceding and the beginning of the present century there was much destruction and plundering of manufactories. In the year 1812 the demolition of factories was punished in England with death, the best the factory burned in Oster in 1831, of the weavers in Germany in 1840, of the Lyons insurrection in France in 1831. It distinguishes itself from previous events by the fact that it is distinct from previous events by the fact that it is an event of a great motive the motto which can think of as written over the proletarian movement: Vivre ou mourir en combattant! That timid formulation of proletarian struggle is negatively an expression of true proletarian effort: negatively—no one shall live if they do not work; positively—those who work shall live. Thus this is the firmament of proletarian agitation: attack external and visible forms in which the spirit is incorporated—upon the machine and machines because in their coming in competition with hand-work, upon the d view the principles which lie behind these things, upon which the capitalistic system of economy rests—free competition in production. It is therefore advance in proletarian agitation as this begins to direct itself to the abolition of modern institutions. Thus the proletariat in England, towards the end of the previous and the beginning of the present century, struggled long for a revival of the Elizabethan trade law. This had specified that every master should have only one apprentice for three workmen. The time of apprenticeship should also be limited to seven years, the wages should be settled by a justice of the peace. This is an instinctive clutching after a protective barrier which seems to be disappearing. Even this is not at first clear; but essentially we find this trait common to all the antecedents of proletarianism, that the movements hold fast to what was in the good old times. Thus, for example, in Germany, the working-man's agitation of 1848 was largely an attempt to reintroduce the old guild system. But it all belongs to the antecedent history of the social movement, because there was no definite aim before the proletariat.
Antecedents

Also to this antecedent history belongs that
The Chartists were of the labouring class; their demands grew immediately from the brief outcroppings of the proletarian agitation: if you wish so to call it. The first organised proletarian movement was proletarian because the great masses of Chartists were of the labouring class; and it fought itself immediately for a material betterment of the oppressed factory-hands. Thus the maximum day's work was put forward as a demand; also, let me remind you of the celebrated phrase of the Rev. Mr. Stedman, who cried out to the masses: "The condition which concerns us here is only one word—bread and fork!" The Chartist movement embodied the aspirations of the proletariat.
finds expression in a genuine hate against employers which at that time possessed the masses and became a battle-cry. O'Connor's word, "Down with the wretches who drink the blood of our children, take pleasure in the misery of our wives, and become satiated by our sweat!" reminds us of the phraseology of the proletarian assemblages of the present day. Further, the demand for the right to work is thoroughly proletarian; so also the right to a full profit from the work, to the "increase" which flows into the pockets of the employer. A symptom of the proletarian character of the Chartist movement is seen in its growing indifference to political questions that do not immediately concern it; as, for example, concerning the abolition of the corn tax. It is interesting to see how gradually the Chartist movement became indifferent towards the most pressing interests of the middle-class; these, though originally included, were finally and completely thrown overboard. Also, in the form of the struggle we find the proletarian character. Thus, at that time the general strike appears as a means of warfare, an idea that can rise only in a true proletarian movement. So without doubt, for these and ions, we have in Chartism a proletation. But I place it in the antecedory, because I miss in it the clear line of the proletarian-social movement, defined aim towards which it works.
Socialism

A programme of the Chartist movement charter, which contains no true postulates, but only a collection of plenary reforms. It is nothing other than a programme built upon which a man stands below nothing better; a programme been taken up by the radical middle-ed moderates. It is O'Connell who transformed the proletariat: "universal suffrage, ot, equal representation, payment for of parliaments, no property qualifica-
...
Antecedents

holds too largely to the external form, which has similarity in both cases so far as these movements aspire after political power; but it is the inner character which is the determining feature of a social movement.

What characterises the antecedent history of the social movement everywhere is, as I have already said, its invariable similarity. Those agitations and exertions which I have specified as characteristic of the earlier history are invariably similar in every land, wherever we can speak of a social movement. But on the very threshold, in the passage from antecedent to present history, the differences in the social movements begin to become apparent. Unity at the beginning; diversity as the movement develops.

I distinguish three types; and for greater simplicity I call them the English, the French, and the German type. Under the English type of the working-man's movement I understand that agitation which has essentially an un-political, purely trade character. As the type of the French movement let me specify that which I call “revolutionism” or “Putschism,” a kind of conspiracy coupled with street fights. And as the German type I specific the lawful parliamentary-politi-ing-man's agitation.
Socialism

are the three different forms in which movement now grows. In them all germs, which in general the social contains, unfold themselves to inlife, develop the peculiar and dif-principles of this agitation. We shall that, after the different nations doped their peculiarities, the social has a tendency again to greater we attempt to make clear these dif-
Antecedents

The English agitation, which is essentially a trade-union movement, they like to speak of as normal and proper; the Continental, which is rather political, as abnormal and improper. How shall we stand on this question? I believe that, in this discrimination and judgment, there is a twofold error, one of method and one of fact. When science pronounces any such judgment, entering into the realm of human history, that is in my opinion an overstepping of the bounds which a scientific man should place about himself. There is presented as objective knowledge a something that is purely subjective and merely the strong private opinion of an interested person—quite regardless of the fact that, as Hegel once expressed it, science always comes too late to teach a man how the world should be. So there lies here what I call a mistake of method. But this manner of looking at the matter involves also a mistake of fact, in that what it specifies as the normal tendency is the most abnormal that has ever existed, because the English social agitation could have become what it is only through a succession of unusual circumstances. For if we take the normal progress of modern capitalistic development jective standard of measurement, and that is the only one which is of avail, would have much more right to say Continental movement is the normal, English the abnormal. I think, howit is more scientific to put aside the _between the normal and the abnorto attempt rather to trace the causes different phases of the social movement lands. That at least shall be my in what follows—to call attention to ions of social movement, and to ex-reason for these variations in certain underestimates as impelling forces the preponderant interests of economic life, and which believes in miracles in the social world.
Socialism

Thus, to make my point clear by an illustration, I hold that the usual explanation of the social development in England is unrealistic, that it cannot claim reality. According to this outline, matters in England have developed somewhat as follows: after the proletariat for some decades, and finally in the Chartist movement, had conducted itself in an unruly way in struggling for its interests, about the middle of this century it suddenly became polite, reconciled itself to the dominant economic order, and made peace with employers, who at the same time had become better men. All this occurred because a new spirit had come into man, a revolution of thought had occurred, a change from the individualistic and utilitarian view of things to a social conception of society and of the position and obligation of the individuals in it. The promoters and teachers of this new spirit are supposed to be, before all, Thomas Carlyle (1795–1881) and the Christian socialists Maurice, Kingsley, Ludlow, and others. Carlyle’s teaching culminates in sentences like these: The evils which have broken
Socialism

For Europe—the French Revolution!—

rest upon this, that the spirit of

for the human race; mammonism, selfishness, forgetful-obligation. This spirit must be re-faith instead of scepticism, idealism of mammonism, self-sacrifice instead of selfishness, and social spirit instead of indi-must again come into the heart of The individual must not be the central is the case in the eudemonistic-utili-philosophy; but social aims, objective deals, shall direct the activity of man.

This conception of the fulfilment of so-station the relation between the proletariat and the individual; no ideal, no

enter love and confidence. The "social question" is solved; at least we are upon the way to "social peace," capitalism is saved, socialism is sloughed off.

I shall investigate later the extent to which the social facts, here asserted, can claim reality; but assuming this—that pure harmony rules in Albion—can such a hyper-idealistic explanation satisfy us? Must we not introduce some more substantial causes than merely the results of Carlyle's sermons?

Absolute proof of the one or the other conception, naturally, cannot be had, because it is the critic's philosophy, his estimate of man, that finally decides; Wallenstein the realist and Max the idealist can never fully convince one another. Anyone can, through a massing of reasons and proofs, make the truth of his assertion concerning certain evident facts at least plausible.

I, for my part, am sceptical concerning all optimistic explanations of history, and believe rather with Wallenstein than with Max. And as now, forced by this ill-favoured mistrust, I look more closely at the development in England of the matter that lies before us, I get a picture essentially different from that which I accomplished such wonders. Institutions which are characteristic of development in England, trade brotherhoods, rules, so far as I healthy spirit of selfishness. Perhaps no social creation which is built tally upon selfishness than the IR necessarily so. And as I read the outpourings of the Christian social complete failure of their exertions, them easily into harmony with other tions. But even allowing that the tain effectiveness of the "social sp does exist, shall I believe that it is move mountains? Or shall I not assume that the economic and pol opment, controlled by selfishness, helped, has created the conditions in social spirit could work?
Antecedents

cult. Let us see how the national peculiarities of the social movement, considering the actual facts of history, can be understood as the necessary results of specific lines of development.
CHAPTER IV

THE DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONAL P1

"Die Staaten (und) Voelker . . . in diese Weltgeistest stehen in ihrem besonderen bestimmten an ihrer Verfassung und der ganzen Breite ihres Zielung und Wirklichkeit hat, deren sie sich bewusst interesse vertieft, sie zugleich bewusstlose Werkzeuge inneren Geschaefts sind, worin diese Gestalten ve an und fuer sich aber sich den Uebergang in seine Stufe vorbereitet und erarbeitet."—HEGEL, Richtig

HOW shall we now, in a word, of the English working-men's I think thus: since 1850 the definite tionary" agitation has ceased—that iming-men's movement accepts the basicalist order of society, and through the establishment of benevolent brotherhoods, and trade-unions, with...
National Peculiarities

is accomplished. Effective legislation for the protection of the working man is secured; concerning which I would remark incidentally that this "elevation" tends in fact only to an aristocracy of working men such that, for example, in London immeasurable misery results—over 100,000 persons in that city are supported by the poor-rates, $25,000,000 are yearly disbursed in charity, one-fifth of the deaths occur in almshouses, public hospitals, etc. But not to dwell on this; other strata of the English proletariat have without doubt considerably improved their condition.

And now to the point;—all this is without part taken by the working man in politics, without the assumption of a political character by the working-men's movement, without constituting an independent working-men's party.

As we seek for the causes of such development, immediately we notice that, whether or not the "social spirit" has helped, we cannot think of this trait without considering a most peculiar combination of political and economic circumstances in England from 1850 to about 1880.

Without doubt the position of industrial monopoly which England reached, and which
Socialism

A tremendous economic impulse to the industrial system has been given as the solid basis of all social development.

A few figures in illustration.

The railroads of the United Kingdom covered:

- in 1842—1,857 English miles,
- in 1883—18,668 English miles.

Ships entering all British harbours:

- in 1842 to 935,000 tons,
- in 1883 to 65,000,000 tons.

The import and export business was valued

- in 1843 at about £103,000,000,
- in 1883 at about £732,000,000.

This means that the other nations could not compete with England in extending the market for an
National Peculiarities

Besides this peculiar combination of circumstances of an economic nature, which can never again come to any land because the competing and strengthened nations now struggle for supremacy in the markets of the world, consider the most remarkable condition of political party life in England.

It is well known that this rests, at least since the beginning of this century, upon an alternation of power between the two great parties, the Tories and the Whigs. They both strive after control, and they reach this from time to time by shrewd concession to the spirit of progress, by a happy use of the situation at the moment. Now one, now the other, quickly seizes and masters it. The tertius gaudens in this struggle for mastery is the working men as a class. It does not require much penetration to see that, for example, the radical English legislation in favour of the working man has come to pass only through the spite of the Tories, agrarian in their interests, against the liberal manufacturers. But if you wish to suppose noble motives for parliamentary majorities, the resolution of the Tories to provide protection for the industrial proletariat must at least have been made easy through the con-
Socialism

in that the land proletariat would never a laws. Later, especially since exten- the franchise, the policy of the Whigs cted to reaching rule, or to sustaining es therein, with the help of the work-
That involved, naturally, concessions it of friendliness to the working class, hard to yield, even if the employers personal interest in these concessions. the employers—thanks again to the combination of circumstances at that England—had without doubt to some direct and personal interest, if not in g, at least in not opposing, the exer the working class for an improvement situation within the limits of the exist unions were a bulwark against all tendency to revolution, sure and strong as no police regulation could erect? And because methods of agreement offered a useful means of avoiding strikes and the consequent disturbances of trade, which were extremely feared because business was always favourable, and because every day they could make money, and because every day in which the manufactory stood still a considerable _lucrum cessans_ was involved?

And, finally, why should not legislation in favour of the working man be recommended? Even if the cost of production is somewhat increased, we are easily in position to recover the charge from the consumer. But production is not necessarily made more costly; the shortening of the hours of labour can be made good through an increased intensity of work, and thereby arises an advantage in having capable workmen, who are gradually paid at higher rates. Or this drawback may be counterbalanced by improvement of machinery; this they were the more willing to do, for capital was abundant, and no bounds would be placed to increase of production and sale by the possibilities of the market. Lastly, they
Socialism

Remember that shrewd legislation in the working man is an excellent or the large concerns to use against in order to do away with the discom-petition of petty manufacturers. This is with the assurance that an ex-f production will not be hindered, or be demanded, by the condition of it.

Now, granting that all could be accom-so easy and business-like a way, as evolution in England has, in fact, accomplished under the said conditions, consider, in addition, the peculiar ent of the English working-man.
ne is such a moderate and practical for the protection of personal interests that has ever been conceived; diplomatic, adroit, smooth towards that which is above—towards the employer; exclusive, narrow, brutal towards that which is underneath—towards four-fifths of the "outsiders," the poorer classes of workmen. The trade unions are capitalistic and business-like organisations, which the calculating practical sense of the English working-man has infused with his spirit. Hence, surely in great part, their large results.
National Peculiarities

Such causes as these seem to me at the bottom of the social development of England from 1850 to 1880. It was the coincidence of a number of circumstances favourable to capital that produced this business-like organisation of the working man—that specific type which we call English.

Thus there is no socialism, no social movement in the strict sense of the term, no struggle of classes; but there is a "social peace," or at least an approach towards such, upon the basis of the capitalistic economy.

Is it truly "social peace"? Perhaps it is only a postponement of the struggle. It seems almost so; unless all signs fail, this "social peace" will not last much longer in England.
Socialism

passing of English supremacy from ets of the world, since the rise of ita of working men, the "social move-again on. The sense of solidarity at the proletariat awakens anew. With the strife of classes. The question of ent political action on the part of the han now stands as a matter of discus-the working-men's congresses. Al-ve socialistic theories and demands pression upon the orthodox member-trade unions. But of this we must peak. I would merely refer to the the time from 1850 to 1880 is rightly period of social stress: it was the tion that comes over from the English type and will remain in the proletariat, even if the direction of agitation becomes essentially different.

And now we leave British ground. Now we step over the Channel, and go into France. What a change of scene! Out of foggy, smoky England, with its earnest, capable, dull populace, into the charming, sunny, warm land of France, with its passionate, impulsive, hasty population.

What kind of a social movement is this in France? I have already given some indications. All ferments and boils there, all bubbles and breaks out uninterruptedly since the "glorious" revolution of the previous century. Parties are in a state of constant flux; a movement divides itself into countless factions. With haste and pressure single acts fall over one another. Parliamentary struggle is set aside, now by bloody street fights, now by conspiracy, now by assassination. To understand clearly this general characteristic, which runs to-day in the very blood of the French proletariat, but which is becoming modified, we must go back to the earlier decades. We must think of the activity of the clubs and
Socialism

One of conspirators in the third and fourth decades of this century; we must recall the street fights which the Parisian proletariat waged with heroism in the June days of 1848, and later, in the May days of 1871. There is, as it were, a smouldering fire that glows constantly in the heart of France, and its leaders, and that, when anything momentous comes to it, breaks out violently and quickly. The social movement of France has always had in it something excited, convulsive. Mighty, magnificent, sudden outbreaks; again faint and languid after the first repulse. Always look-Factionism, clubbism, and Putschism. Factionism is the tendency to separate into innumerable small parties; clubbism is the desire of conspiracy in secret companies and conventicles; Putschism, finally, is the fanatical tendency towards street struggle, faith in the barricade.

Whence all this? One thing springs immediately to the attention of the student of French history: what we here have learned to recognise as a characteristic trait of the movement of the French proletariat is to be found almost without change in all the actions of the French middle-classes. Indeed, it is evidently an inheritance that the proletariat has assumed. Unnoticeably the one movement passes into the other. The French proletariat is led into history by the hand of the bourgeoisie. Long after the proletariat in France had begun an independent agitation, the influence of this former movement was conspicuous. Not only in the method of strife; as well in the programmes and ideals of the French proletariat, this middle-class spirit stands even to our latest time, so that we can understand why Proudhon, the greatest theorist of the revolutionary movement, as late as after 1848 had influence rules of the French proletariat. That was really a bourgeois theorist is true, but is none the less true; how- revolutionar is his phraseology may be, all proposals for reform—whether the ex- pand credit banks, or the wage theory, establishment of value,"—point to an thing, a strengthening, an ethicizing ofThus production and the exchange of service.
Socialism

No one who looks at the matter will at the long predominance of middle- ence in the French proletarian move- What prestige the French, especially an, middle-class has won in the eyes of ulace in the course of later French.

National Peculiarities

has levelled the ground; that is the historic significance of the Reign of Terror, and with it of the middle class that since those days has borne an aureole upon its head.

But it is not only this rather ideal element that is responsible for the preponderance of the middle-class influence in France; we must add the weighty fact that a great part of the specifically French industries, owing to the peculiar organisation in ateliers, bears a half-individualistic character, and that these are largely industries of the arts. Thus the Lyons silk industry and many of the Parisian manufactures of luxury. These are in sharp contrast, for example, to the great English staple industries of coal, iron, and cotton. The French ouvrier, in Lyons directly called maître ouvrier, assumes, through the tendency and organisation of many French industries, a more individualistic, and so middle-class, appearance than the proletariat in other lands.

But to understand the characteristics which are stamped upon the social movement in France as an inheritance from the middle class, to explain that enthusiasm for revolution of which I have spoken to you, we must
Socialism

the whole history of France. That -a sanguine, enthusiastic race, with a temperament, with a dash which is not and in those of northern lands. Per-

French type of the social movement, modified by German influence, is be found in Italy; there we must see its peculiar characteristics, the response of large masses, the straw fire revolutionary enthusiasm—in short, we must had clearly an entirely different mode and feeling in order to comprehend uch, or, if you will, Roman, type of revolutionist, in its heaven-wide dif-from the English workman. Victor

National Peculiarities

Thus one of Latin race strives after a far-off object, and does not shrink from forceful means of reaching it. This heaven-storming temperament has been given to him by nature for his mission in history. Further, in order to understand the character of the social movement in France, think of the preponderance in this land of the capital city, Paris! If Paris is not exactly France, as is often asserted, yet it is strong enough to dictate on occasion the laws of the people. Paris, this nerve ganglion! This rumbling volcano!

Further, I have always the impression that the French people stand even to-day under the influence, perhaps we may say the ban, of their "glorious" revolution. The influence of such an event—the most tremendous drama of history—cannot in one hundred years disappear from a people. So I think that this nervosity, if I may so express it, which clings to all public life in France, may be, in large part, a heritage from those terrible years of general overthrow, an inheritance that has been most carefully fostered in less glorious revolutions since then—ah, how many! And out of that time springs something else: an overmastering faith in force, in the availability political riot. The history of France developed itself since the July days of her from without to within, than from to without; the change of régime has mighty rôle, has often worked decision on the progress of social life. It is age that always they rest their hope and seek to use further, as a means of improvement, the political revolution which wrought so mightily. This belief in man stands, however, in close connection, with the specifically French, individual, ideal-socialistic philosophy of the 19th century, of which I have heretofore of pure revolutionism in method, of middle-class ideals as object? Are not Ravachol and Caserio the true sons of those conspirators who inspired the France of 1830 and 1840? Is there any more legitimate father of anarchy than Blanqui? Anarchy, we may say, is born of the marriage of the social philosophy of the eighteenth century with the revolutionism of the nineteenth; it is a bloody renaissance of social utopism.
Socialism

Here mention must be made of a matter which I have carefully avoided thus far, because it is an hypothesis which I must lay before you with a question-mark. Has the fact that the land is divided among so many small owners had any effect upon the peculiar development of the modern anarchistic movement? I mean, there must be a connection between both these phenomena. Indeed, it is a question as to how far anarchism has ever obtained in the masses. But, so far as I can see, wherever the anarchistic propaganda seems to spread it is always in agrarian districts; I recall the work of Bakunin in Italy and Spain, and, as well, the nestling of anarchism now again in France. And wherever the country people have been aroused to indeagitation, this movement has always at least a trace of anarchism. For example, Italy and Spain and Ireland.

An interesting problem is, and if so, is anarchy the theoretical expression of revolution? The investigation of this would be away from my present purpose, to speak of the proletarian-socialistic. But I would at least present it.

Ask me, finally, what lasting effect the memory of the French agitation has had upon international movement of the proletarian—perhaps the least of all the since it bears unmistakable marks of necessity. But I believe that it will be the for all other races, because of the ideal-disturbances—suddenly, in the year 1863, as if shot out of a pistol, appears an independent political working-men's party, not again to disappear, but to grow to mighty proportions.
National Peculiarities

Whence comes this strange apparition of such a social agitation in Germany? How can we explain the suddenness of its entrance, and especially the fundamental traits of its character—its legal-parliamentary tendency, and its self-reliance from the beginning even until now?

At first we may incline to the thought that the causes for the peculiarities of agitation in Germany should be sought in the personality of its founder, Ferdinand Lassalle. Without doubt we owe much to the individuality of this extraordinary man. We know what kind of a fire it was that burnt consumingly within him—a demoniacal ambition, a Titanic eagerness for fame. And as this ambition, after many years of scientific renown, finally led him into the sphere of politics, wherein all ambitious men who cannot be generals and artists in our time must necessarily go, it was only natural that the masterful Lassalle should become leader, chief, prince. Where Bismarck stood, another could stand only in the shadow;
Socialism

Opposition would not have Lassalle—by about 1855-1865 he desired to ally with them, but they feared this man to yield themselves. There was only one thing, to become the leader and distinct party, the working-men's party, Lassalle's party in the strictest sense, his hammer, his sword, with which to fight for himself and in the political field. These personal elements must be aided by the conditions, the specific conditions of economy and social life in Germany, in order in Lassalle's efforts with success to thoroughly the movement during the period of his leadership.
National Peculiarities

like that in France, was not at this time possible—even if we assume that German character would thus incline. The opportunity came too late. Revolutionism in the French sense bears, as I have already said, the mark of unripeness. Revolutionism may influence a nation long, but it cannot be made the ruling motive of a social movement at so late a point of time as that at which the German agitation began because the stage of unripeness has passed. Take for example Italy, whose people certainly by nature tend towards revolutionism; yet they must conform to the experiences of older lands even if the inner nature always urges to outbreak.

On the other hand, Germany, as its social agitation began, was yet so immature economically—like England at the end of the last century—that the subordination of economic to political agitation is easily understood.

But would it not have been perhaps more natural if the proletariat, when it desired to enter into a legal-parliamentary course of action, had sought alliance with the existing party of opposition—as has happened in other lands? We must lay stress on the fact that it was hindered in this through the incapacity of the middle-class party of that time in radical poli-
Socialism

For this reason it could not at the time the proletariat.

A part of the inheritance which Germany has received from the year 1848 are of its chief characteristics is the fear of spectre—revolution. Indeed the empire has itself helped towards this by its laws. We all know how the middle-class of the year 1848 in Germany failed, sought the protection of the Prussian bayo- in the "gens mal intentionnés"—the own undercurrent of democracy present of civil revolution. Civic pride and de-fell at that moment, as always, when the of social revolution appeared on the——witness the law against the socialists.

National Peculiarities

dreary Manchester school of thought. The exertions of Schulze-Delitzsch, who was indeed in his sphere a serviceable man, could not nearly make good the shortcomings of the liberal party in all questions of social politics. The liberal political economists of that time had no understanding of the demands and movements of the proletariat. Such pitiful writings on the so-called "working-man's question" as those by Prince-Smith are not produced by writers of reputation in other lands, so far as I know. Possibly this or that great man de l'Institut has rivalled them.

The inability of the liberal party to draw the gushing water of proletarian agitation to its own mill finds striking example in the answer which, in the year 1862, a deputation of working-men from Leipsic received from the leaders of the "National Union." The working men had applied for the privilege of taking part in political life. They wanted some recognition for their leaders. And what was given as answer? That the working men were by birth already honorary members of the union!

And now Bismarck, in spite of the fact that the liberal party was refusing the franchise to
Socialism

...etariat, forced upon the country in the 77 a universal, direct, and secret ballot, st of Lassalle's. We are tempted to diabolical revenge against the liberals ative for this. For the moulding of al movement in Germany this had quences of fundamental importance.
weakened yet more the middle class, ow between the aristocracy and the at, was sinking into an ever-increasing ance and, through fear of the growing men's party, lost more and more of its ence. Hence a further estrangement the liberal party and the proletarian ent ensued.

edly, this franchise that had fallen into
National Peculiarities

objects of political effort. But the purpose of science is only to explain how things have unfolded themselves; and only that is the idea which has ruled throughout this my work. But of course there are always people unable to separate science and politics.

One remark in conclusion! This Lassalle movement, and with it also the German type of social agitation, bears the stamp not only of historic-national interest, as I have attempted to show to you, but also much of purely personal characteristics; as is proved by the mysticism, the cult of a person and the creation of a sect, to which the movement has deteriorated. Has it never occurred to you how remarkable it is that this movement, perhaps more than any other, has developed, in spite of its German and personal characteristics, into a world-wide and enduring "school," if I may so express it? Of this there can be no doubt.

One ground for this may be found in the personality of its creator, in the passionate force of his oratory, in the power of his agitation. Treitschke thinks that Germany has possessed three great agitators, List, Blum, and Lassalle. Surely Lassalle is the greatest
Socialism

The proletariat thus far; the only of real greatness which the proletariat far had. For this reason his person-continues in force even until now.

Slau a churchyard—a dead man in grave;
slumbers the one who to us the sword gave."

Here again we are not satisfied with the personal element; we must rather seek real grounds for the explanation of

It seems that the triumph of the type in the international movement, begun through Lassalle, lies essenthe circumstance that Lassalle's agitathen the later German movement, is movement international, to unify it. But of this we must not here speak; only of its peculiar features. The one great social movement runs first into separate streams of national effort; later these unite again. There is throughout a tendency to return to unity. But the movement develops itself in national lines and is determined by contingencies which make history. The general law of these incidental circumstances I have tried to show to you to-day.

And now at last let us pass to the theorist of the social movement, Karl Marx.
CHAPTER V

KARL MARX

"Κτήμα ἐσ ἄτιον"

Thuc., i., 22.

MARX was born in Treves in the year 1818, the son of a Jewish lawyer, later baptised into the Christian faith. Science and general culture were at home in the house of his parents. The favourite of the family were Rousseau and purposing to become a Prussian professor. By the year 1842 he came to the point of formal admission as lecturer. But difficulties soon presented themselves; the young Marx, then allied with Bruno Bauer, was carried away by the reactionary tendency which at that time swept again over the Prussian universities, especially over heretical Bonn. As customarily happens in such cases of aborted career, the young Marx became a journalist. Soon he emigrated, because in 1844 the Prussian police drove him out of the land; he fled to Paris, was thrown out again by Guizot on demand, we suppose, of Prussia; in 1845 he went to Brussels, returning to Germany during the year 1848; finally after the year 1849 he found rest in London from the pressure of the police. Here he lived until his death in the year 1883.

His personality, the characteristics of which were strikingly developed through the external circumstances of his life, was marked by extraordinary intellectual activity. He was a pitiless and positive critic in his very nature. He had an abnormally sharp vision for psychological and historical continuity, especially where these are based upon the less noble impulses
Socialism

A word of Pierre Leroux's seems as if coined for Marx: "il était étrant sur le mauvais côté de la nature de." So it was by nature easy for him to believe in Hegel's teaching that "evil" has finished all the development of mankind. The conception of the world is expressed in Einstein's magnificent words:

"The bad spirit belongs to the earth, not to the good; all things that the gods send to us from above are to be received only in communal possession. Their light shall be a joy, yet makes no man rich; in their kingdom is no private possession."

qualified Karl Marx to reach the peak among the social philosophers of the
Karl Marx

tan experience to withdraw attention from the incidental features of national development, and to concentrate it upon what is typical in modern social life.

Marx, in common with his friend Friedrich Engels, in a large number of monographs, the best known of which is Capital, has laid the ground-lines of an amazing system of social philosophy; but this is not the place for a study of its particular features. What interests us much more at this time is the Marxian theory of social agitation, because this is especially what has enabled him to influence decisively the progress of social development. In no single book of his is this theory comprehensively presented. Yet we find all the essential elements of it in the celebrated "Communist Manifesto" of Marx and Engels in the year 1847, which was presented as a programme to the "League of the Righteous" in Brussels; they accepted it and thus changed themselves into a "League of Communists." The "Communist Manifesto" contained the principles of a philosophy of history, upon which the programme of a party is based. Its leading thoughts are these:

All history is the story of a struggle between the history of the present is the story of struggle between the middle class and proletariat. The making of classes results in certain economic conditions of production and distribution, through which also social conditions are determined. "Immanent" forces (the term does not occur in the "Communist Manifesto," but becomes later a technical term) would revolutionise the conditions of production and thus of all economic matters. In the process this organic change is accomplished with great rapidity, because the tremensous forces of production created by the middle class grow too fast. Thus on the one side the conditions of existence under the present capitalist economy quickly deteriorate; upon of momentary barbarism," and in the emergence of pauperism in which it plainly appears now "that the middle class is unfit longer to remain the ruling class of society and to enforce the life condition of itself as the ruling law; it is unfit to rule because it is incapable of securing subsistence to its slave within the terms of his slavery, because it is compelled to let him sink into a position in which it must support him instead of being supported by him."
Socialism

But the conditions of the new social order (this thought also is merely suggested in the "Communistic Manifesto" and only later, especially by Engels, is it developed) are created by an enormous increase of the forces of production and by the "communication of the processes of production" which goes hand in hand with this increase—that is, the interweaving and combination of the individual acts of production, and transition to co-operative methods, etc.

The most important consequence now for our question is this: the economic revolution finds its spontaneous expression in opposition and struggle of classes, the "modern social movement"—that is, the movement of the proletariat is nothing but the organisation of those elements of society which are called to break
Socialism

The middle class and "to conquer all social forces of production." This can accomplish only by "abolishing their private appropriation as it has thus far and with it the whole idea of private property"; that is, in place of private possession and private production to establish common ownership of the means of production by the "communists"—that is, the political party which the "Communist Manifesto" was a confession of faith—are only a part warring proletariat; they form that part of the conscious of the process of development. This party fines itself from the other proletarian elements

Karl Marx

The thoughts here expressed, as I have already indicated in several places in this review, have been later to some extent more precisely worded, have been to some degree enlarged and developed, have been in part modified; but the ground-lines of Marx's theory of the social movement are already revealed in them all. In what now lies their historic importance? How shall we explain their tremendous power of conquest? Whence comes their continuance already through a half-century?—and all this, in spite of the fact that, as I believe, this theory errs in essential points, and that it can scarcely indeed sustain itself as a whole!

Before I now attempt to give the answer I must make one thing clear. What Marx and Engels have left to us as an intellectual inheritance, whether we consider their writings from 1842, or even only those after 1847, seems at first as if it were a confused mass of varied thought-material. Only he who looks closely and who takes the trouble to enter into the spirit of the men can bring the separated lines of thought into order. Such an one finds that some fundamental ideas run through the writings of Marx and Engels during the whole period of their literary activity; also that at ...times quite different lines of thought and confuse the system which, as a whole, has been built up upon these great ideas. Proponents of the Marxian teaching, especially those representing the middle class, have been able to do justice to the historic essence of these theories. Naturally it is right to start with the contradictions and inci...
Socialism

"middle-class" critics of Marx; but it is also because of the members of his own party. I recall the fact that the fundamental principle of Marx's economic system—the theory of value—has become an object of fruitful discussion as lately as two years ago. At that time I attempted to bring into use this method which I have just specified as the only true one for such a peculiar formation as the Marxian teaching; I asked how the parts of Marx's theory which stand in such opposition to each other could be reconciled, in order to bring out the sense which so earnest a thinker must surely have laid underneath. At that time the aged Engels could bear witness that I had about "hit the right mark," but that he could not endorse all that I had "introduced" into the Marxian teaching. Other critics thought at the time that nothing more would be heard of Marx's teaching concerning value. Perhaps they are right; but if Marx's Theory of Value is a scientific work, it can be such only in my interpretation.

I have thus spoken in order to show you how I stand concerning Marx's theory of the social movement. I make most earnest effort to separate it from all extraneous matter, to hend it in its essential points, and so to these essentials in such way that they are consistent with reality. At the same emphasise the spirit of Marx's theories, I hope that it is truly the soul of Marx, of myself, "in which the times reflect tes." I'll attempt to speak later concerningook upon as confusing "non-essentials" theory; I speak now of what I think to historically important essence—the of Marx's theory of the social content.
Socialism

and before all, it is a scientific accomplishment of the first order to give prominence historic conception of the social move-fundamentally great displacements of social classes is a truth enunciated before the time of Marx; but no one has ever presented it in so impressive a way. He takes economic revolutions as his starting-point, in order to explain the creation and the conflict of social classes; and in Misère (175), before the "Communistic Manifesto," he had already said: "il n'y a jamais de mouvement politique qui ne soit social en même temps." But therewith—and it is this that is of importance to us—is the proletariat brought to full self-consciousness and taught to know itself in its historic relations. Out of this historic conception arises, for Marx and for the proletariat, with certainty the main points of the programme and the tactics of the social movement. They are only "a general expression of actual relations in an existing struggle of classes," as the "Communistic Manifesto" has expressed it somewhat vaguely. To state it more exactly, the theory of Marx affirms the identification of that which unconsciously and instinctively had arisen as a proletarian idea with that which is actually observable as the result of economic development. As to tactical management, however, the idea was decisive that revolutions
Socialism

t be forced, but were the outgrowth of economic antecedents; while class both its forms—the political, of which communistic Manifesto speaks chiefly, economic, for which in Misère a lance—is recognised as the instrument which the proletariat must use in protect its interests during the process of transformation. Thus he formulates which every intelligent proletarian must recognise as its fundamental. Socialism as a goal, struggle begins as the way towards it, cease to by personal opinions, and are unnecessary.

Elementary conception, that these two movement which fully satisfies the demands of our day as to scientific method. It is known that Marx stands upon the Hegelian dialectic, out of date now. What we demand is a psychological founding of social happening, and for this Marx cares little.

Now it seems to me easy to fill this gap. I shall attempt it so far as the limitations of time allow.

Why must the ideal of every proletarian movement be necessarily a democratic collectivism—that is, the communisation of the means of production? It seems to me that the following considerations contain the answer to the question.

The modern social movement strives after that which is represented by the battle-cry, "The emancipation of the proletariat." But this has two phases, an ideal and a material. Ideally a social class can consider itself as "emancipated" only when it as a class is economically and politically dominant or at least independent; the proletariat, that now finds itself in economic dependence upon capital, can only become "emancipated" by throwing off this connection. Perhaps we can conceive of the proletariat as using employers to carry on the work of production, then the management will be no in the hands of the employers as to-of the proletariat as master of the
Socialism

So long as this supremacy is not in any such form, there can be no of an "emancipation" of a class.
we speak of this "emancipation" in all sense, so long as those conditions ich to-day, from a class standpoint, nd upon as marking a social inferiority erved from the capitalistic social sys-the proletariat sets an aim clearly be-
, this goal can only be, from the class at, the overthrow of this capitalistic Now this overthrow is possible in
Karl Marx

will be socialism. There is no third possibility. If the proletariat does not vanquish capitalism by a return to the smaller forms of operation, it can accomplish this only by putting a socialistic organisation in place of the capitalistic. And further: the proletariat can attach itself only to the latter method, because its whole existence is interwoven with the system of production on a large scale; it is indeed only the shadow of the system, it exists only where this system rules. Therefore we can say that socialism as the aim of the social movement arises fundamentally and necessarily out of the economic situation of the proletariat. The whole demonstration falls to the ground in a moment, wherever a tendency to the development of proletarian production on a large scale does not exist in economic life.

What I would here show, let me say again, is the necessity of the ideal; but this must not be confused with the certainty of its realisation. In order to prove this, it would be necessary to present other considerations, which lie far from our subject. Thus, whether any such realisation of the ideal is scientifically possible seems to be doubtful. For this would not be proved even if it should be demonstrated that
Socialism

The proletariat desires and strives for has ished in the course of social developeshall have opportunity later to draw to this, that the conception of social-heed of nature, and thus "necessary-realised, does not rest upon clear we must now hold fast as the result investigation is this, and it is a true hought, that social ideals are only so long as they are merely evolved of the theorist. They obtain real-then they are united to actual eco-ditions, when they arise out of these

. The possibility of realising the beautiful is enclosed within the groups of persons whose homogeneity arises out of their attachment to specific forms or spheres of economic life. We distinguish the "junker," as representative of feudal agrarianism, from the bourgeoisie, the representatives of capital; we distinguish the "middle class," the representatives of local production and distribution, from the modern wage-worker or the proletariat, etc. Each one of these groups of economic interests has its special adherents in the professional classes of society among the officials, scholars, artists, who stand outside the economic life, but who unite themselves by birth or position to one or another of the social classes.

This attachment to a social class works decisively in two directions. It implants in the mind of each individual member of a class the conception of the world and life characteristic of that group of men whose thoughts and feelings tend to become identical through the uniformity of the external circumstances that control them; similarity of aspiration and ideal is created. Further, this attachment accomplishes a positive control over the individual in the maintenance of that which is represented by the class—its social position as truly as its interests; it creates what we may call here and spontaneously there is de-distinction between classes, and class involved in this. The upholding of interest leads throughout to class op-Not always does the upholding of a ard involve necessarily collision with ists of other classes; at times an identerests arises; but this harmony never the interest of the "junker" must at a int come into conflict with that of er, that of the capitalist with that of ariat, that of the hand-worker and with that of the large capitalist; for strives naturally for itself, and by motive, each class will freely divest itself of such of its privileges as stand in the way of others? I have already had occasion in another place to express my opinion on this point—that I look upon such well-intentioned judgment of average human nature as in contradiction with actual life. I have referred to the fact that conclusive proof for or against such a conception cannot be presented; that the final ground of decision rests in the depths of personal conviction on the part of the individual. But what offers some proof for the justification of the realistic opinion presented by me is the circumstance that history has as yet given no example of a free divestment of class privilege; at least I will say that every instance claimed as such may easily be invalidated. On the other side we have innumerable instances in history where such reform has been begun by well-meaning friends of humanity, theorists, only to be shattered soon on the rocher de bronze of the strong self-interest of the threatened dominant class. They eagerly hold up before us unbelievers the night of the 4th of August, 1789, and they forget the hundred burning castles in France. They remind us of the Prussian agrarian reforms, and forget not
Socialism

Socialism

French Revolution but also the Dec-1816. They remind us—but why ations? Let such men prove au-ly single case in history in which a s has against its own interests and uistic motives made an essential con-certainly there have been conspicuals who have done this; why not?
is daily. But a whole class—never!
so, then the word of the great realist true, that “only strength conquers.”
ed as the conclusion of our thought, ference of classes, then class interests, opposition, finally class strife. It is arx would have developed his theory strife, and easily, if he had chosen to the social movement the idea of "revolution" passes into the thought of "evolution." The spirit of the nineteenth century supplants the spirit of the preceding centuries. You remember how I sought to make clear to you the essence of this spirit in connection with the teachings of the utopists; if I may be allowed to refer to it again, it is that idealistic conception of man and life, cherishing now only by the scholars, that faith in humanity as good by nature, that belief that men so long as they are not led astray by the mistake or malice of individual bad men will live in the most affectionate peace with their brethren; it is that belief in a "natural order" of the past and future—that rock-fast confidence that only explanation and exhortation are needed in order to bring men out of this vale of tears to the happy islands of the blest. This is that faith in the power of eternal love which through its own force shall overcome the bad, and help the good to victory. This it was that, though the leaders were not conscious of it, really lay at the bottom of all political and social agitation until the middle of our century; this it is

1 In what follows I reproduce some passages out of my book concerning Friedrich Engels (Berlin, 1895).
Socialism

...my opinion, as I have already said, lies in the lap of anarchism even to this instinct. This fundamental tendency is rectly reversed; the belief in a human and by nature gives place to the concept that man is of himself ruled by no instincts, that he carries within himself humaine even in all culture and in all “advance.” Hence the conclusion: man, in order to accomplish anything in the world, must before all call upon “inter-formal and material instinct. For it is the most important conclusion for the fate of social movement, that now “interest” the world; that where anything is to or a class, like the proletariat, is to conciliation, not a general brotherhood—but battle. That this strife is no longer open warfare, like street riot, does not alter the fact that it is really strife. Out of this is to come a generation of men qualified to live and work in an order of society higher than the present capitalistic order.
Karl Marx

It is this that I call the realistic conception of the social movement; and there is no doubt that it is the outcome of that Marxian theory of the world and society which I have just attempted to sketch. Only thus could the social-political realism, which heretofore has been proclaimed in a limited way, now arise as the principle of the whole social movement.

It is this social-political realism which gives the finishing stroke to all utopism and revolutionism. The insurrectionists in Lyons and the Chartist revolutionaries were both utopists—for they shed their blood and yet only strengthened the reaction. The Putschists, Clubists, and Blanquists were utopists, who through conspiracies and street riots would through all time control economic development. Not less utopian were those “geniuses” who offered exchange banks or the Organisa-ravail or such remedies. Utopists those who believed in the power of of schemes. Finally, utopists were kindly souls who hoped to allay and the sufferings of the proletariat by to the good hearts of the friends of Karl Marx has succeeded in freeing the use of empty phrases in the social politics.
Socialism

Now in closing recapitulate the points see the historic significance of Marx's for the social movement. Marx points object the communisation of the means of action, as its way the struggle between he erects these two as the main pillars of the whole structure must be built.
fathom the spirit of his teaching; this is the deep meaning of Marxism.

There is no doubt that, according to the common idea, Marx and Engels, who must always be named with him, appear in a light essentially different from that which I have attempted to show to you. In general these men have been looked upon, not only as different from what I have stated, but as in a bad sense the very opposite of social realists; namely, as the father and the guardian of the worst kind of revolutionary thought. And who would not apparently be justified in this belief, reading the writings of both these men? He reads of clanking chains which must be broken, of revolutions towards which man tends, of bloody battle and death and assassination. How does the matter really lie?

Marx himself once said, Moi je ne suis pas Marxiste, but he gave to these words a meaning different from the ordinary one, as I also do when I say that Marx and Engels have not always shown themselves consistent Marxists either in theory or in practice.

Doubtless there are inconsistencies in theory, contradictions of the fundamental thoughts, discrepancies which can have only
Socialism

— that is, an overwhelming revolution which obscures a vision otherwise.

I think of their unreasonable that they call the "fall" of humanity by the introduction of the principle of property, from which as they say his as well the forces of history, take ; the astonished hearer asks himself, dwell man to the introduction of this

I think, also, of the hypothesis of condition of humanity after the in of socialism — and the like. Here, ghout, the old dreams of a Paradise regained, of a happy condition of hu- finally, come as a disturbing element conditions; thus it was an error of judgment as to the time, if not a contradiction of their supreme principle that "revolutions are not made." Psychologically these contradictory phenomena are easily to be explained. Both Marx and Engels have never ceased with intelligence and calm judgment to present that realism which we have seen as the essence of their view of life. But you must not forget that they have conceived their teachings under the roar of revolutionary battles; that they were themselves of those fitful and fiery souls who, like the "world squirrel,"¹ go assiduously from place to place in order to set Europe on fire. Think of the mass of malice and hatred that must have accumulated within these exiles, who experienced through life nothing but derision, scorn, suspicion, and persecution from their powerful opponents! Imagine what a superhuman self-discipline and control was needed to prevent them from petty and vindictive attacks upon the hated opponents at every opportunity. As this deeply ¹In German mythology the world is represented as a great tree, with its roots in Niefelheim, and its branches in Asgard. Wotan communicates with the world by a "welten eichhoernchen," a "world squirrel," which runs up and down the tree.
Karl Marx

(Translator.)
Socialism

Passion arose in these revolutionary outbursts, almost strangling them, their rage out of the window and old revolutionary zeal broke out and overwhelmed them. I am right in characterising Marxism as political realism you see clearly from the and fundamental declarations and actions of its founders, which come out of all periods of their lives. And indeed there is always a declared opposition to revolutionism, to "Putschism," as they saw it, from their standpoint. The strife with the Willich-Schapper in the year 1850, with Bakunin in the "International," among which I have yet to speak,—the latter two against the anarchists, the discuss-drama, a confession, the last words of warning which the dying man cries to the contesting proletariat. Here the clear, logical position, as I think it is demanded by the conception of history held by that school, finally comes to distinct expression. This introduction shows perhaps best and most quickly how at the end Engels and Marx understood the social movement. Some of the most significant passages may here find place:

"History has proved wrong us and all who thought similarly (sc. expecting the victory of the proletariat in the near future of the year 1843). It has made clear that the condition of economic development upon the Continent at that time was far from ripe for an abolishment of capitalistic production; it has proved this through the economic development which since 1848 has seized upon the whole continent and has made a home for the great industries in France, Austria, Hungary, Poland, and lately Russia, has made out of Germany an industrial country of the first rank—all upon a capitalistic basis, which in the year 1848 was but little developed. To-day the great international army of socialists is resistlessly stepping forward, is daily growing in number, discipline, intelligence, and assurance of victory. As to-day this mighty army of the proletariat has not as yet reached the goal, as it is far from accomplishing the victory by one great stroke, but must slowly press forward in hard persistent struggle from position this proves once for all how impossible it was in 1848 to accomplish the social overturn—a simple unexpected attack. . . . The rise of carrying through a revolution by a tyrant at the head of ignorant masses, is passed. The overthrow of the social organisation they must be concerned, they must under-why they take part. The history of years has taught this to us. But through the masses are learning what is to be done, and patient work is needed, and that it is work which we now urge forward with such our opponents are brought to confusion. history turns everything upside down. We, crieres, succeed far better by means legal and destructive. The party of order, as it goes to pieces through the very conditions itself. It cries out confusedly with Odelon égalité nous tue (conformity to the law kills
Socialism

CHAPTER VI

THE TREND TOWARDS UNITY

"Schon längst verbreit etsich's in ganze Scharen Das Eigenste, was im allein gehoert."

Schiller's Wallenstein.

Now, after long, that diffuses itself through large masses of men
Which once was most private, which belonged to him alone.

Karl Marx closed his manifesto with the celebrated words, "Proletarians of all lands, unite yourselves!" He uttered this cry on the eve of the revolution of 1848, which was admittedly proletarian-socialistic in its component, in various places, but which exa-hausted itself in those separate spots where it had broken out. In Germany, where Marx himself stood in the battle, it reached no importance. In England, it seemed for a moment as if the February revolution would infuse new life into the old Chartism; but this had already been buried. The French movement is the only one left; how it ended is well known. And then the deep night of the reac-
Socialism

The 'fifties settled upon Europe. All of an independent working-men's union movement was developed. Only in England, a beginning of the year 1860 signs among the working people have appeared at different places. They recover here from the blows and repression which experience during and after the agitation and an interest and participation in the begin again to awake. The characteristic is this: the activity of the new independent life receives an international. Naturally this is no mere chance. It by chance that, at the World's Ex-the working men of different lands
The Trend towards Unity

never quite disappeared from proletarian agitation, even though it may have experienced in the course of the years essential changes in the form of its development.

It will be my duty in what follows to show to you how this tendency towards internationalism, after many abortive attempts, has been really carried out, and how, in close connection with it as concerns goal and progress, the social agitations of individual lands more and more press towards a unity upon the principles of the Marxian programme.

The first form in which an attempt was made for international combination of the proletariat is the celebrated "International." Allow me to dwell somewhat at length upon this. It is essentially of importance and interest for two reasons. One is that through it, and its speedy end, a specific form of the internationalising of the social agitation has been brought ad absurdum. The other is, because in it with striking clearness contradictions are presented, which pervade all social agitation.

It was in the year 1862, when the French working-men, at the World's Exposition in London, agreed with the English workers to counsel together concerning united agitation.
Socialism

conferences ensued, and in 1864 a s founded which had as its object the of the representatives of workmen of lands for common action and advance.
the International Association. What duties, what was the thought, of such brotherhood? Apparently twofold. We ose that they meant to create merely of correspondence bureau—a place working men of different lands

ite in a general international secreto which they might turn for informacerning any question pertaining to tal movement—that is, an institution erting an influence upon the agi-

the working men in the various lands.
larger meaning was Karl Marx, who was called upon to play a decisive rôle in the founding of the International Working-Men's Association. For him this organisation was the first answer to his cry to the world, "Proletarians of all lands, unite yourselves!" It is not to be doubted that if a central organisation was to be created, to reveal a spirit of unity and to ensure a unification of national proletarian agitation, the Marxian spirit should control. Although he viewed the situation clearly enough to see that extremest caution was needed, he aimed to unite the many streams into one great river.

The "International" was founded upon the basis of the so-called "Inaugural Address" and the "Statutes," both of which were evolved by Karl Marx and accepted as he presented them. In them great diplomatic skill is revealed. The "Inaugural Address" is a masterpiece of diplomatic finesse. It is indefinite throughout its whole structure, rendered purposely so by Karl Marx. He aimed, by it, to cover various parties of the time, the Proudhonists, the working-men's associations of France, the trade unions in England, the followers of Mazzini in Italy, the
Socialism

As the Lassalle agitation in Germany it actually accomplished this in a way. It commended itself to each one of them. It pictures in effective misery into which the working people are forced by capitalism; it finds words of denunciation for the results of the English trade. It praises the characteristics and serves the "free-coöperative movement" of the Count Duchez; but it has also a friendly feeling towards the organisations which receive aid from the state—Lassalle, Blanc.

Yet it all is drawn only this conclusion, which all sympathise—that the proletariat should be conscious of an international solidarity. In some general and senti-concerning it. Very little reference was made to the objects of the International Working-Men's Association. Its activity during the first years consisted essentially in the support of strikes, for which reason it enjoyed at the beginning the lively sympathy of many outside of the circles of working men.
The Trend towards Unity

But now Marx began to develop his plan systematically; that is, slowly to fill the International Working-Men's Association with his spirit, and through it to support the proletarian agitation of different lands. As we look at the congresses of this organisation, in Geneva, 1866; Lausanne, 1867; Brussels, 1868; Basle, 1869, we find that in fact, step by step, from congress to congress, the International Working-Men's Association supports more and more the Marxian ideas, noticeably, and without any appearance of the moving spirit on the scene. But now it is interesting to observe, and it shows the degree of development which at that time the social movement had reached, that the time for the inspiration of the whole European world of working men with the Marxian ideas evidently had not yet come. In proportion as the "International" began to display the spirit of Marx, opposition raged quarter. The Proudhonists began to act; then the trade unions, especially at the moment when Marx declared his sympathy with the Commune in Paris; followers of Lassalle began to grumble at a great part of the opposition crystallized. In this manner, towards the end of the 'sixties, a new movement, which Michael Bakunin. As to the part played by personal anger and envy played in this movement, we are not interested. It is possible that this personal friction was essentially the reason for the destruction of the "International.
Socialism

It seems to me, however, that at the time of the antagonism of Bakunin against Marx's socialism, a much more essential and considerate position. For in 1868 Bakunin founded whole activity upon the idea of revolution by force, upon the belief that revolutions must be made because they can be made. In opposition to him, Marx defended the fundamental thought that a revolution is at most the last feature of a process of development, the breaking of the husk through the ripening of the fruit.
The Trend towards Unity

The opposition of Bakunin led finally, as is well known, to the dissolution of the International Working-Men's Association. In 1872 its general office was transferred to New York, apparently in order to avoid a formal burial of the organisation.

Thus it came to pass that the Bakunists were shut out, and with them were a number of "exclusions" from the circles of the orthodox; the process of excommunication began, which to-day, as you know, is not ended. Exactly the same thought lies at the bottom of the exclusion of the Bakunists from the "International" as, this very year, in the driving of the anarchists out of the London congress. Always again the contradiction presents itself, socialism and anarchism; or, as deeply understood, evolutionism and revolutionism.
Socialism

was shattered that first attempt to union of the proletariat of all lands, will be many years before the thought of national solidarity can again rule the man. In spite of its speedy ruin, the "international" has large historic significance, lies in the fact that for the first time in history the internationalism of the movement of the international community of the proletariat in some measure expression; further, in that for the first time the social movement of different countries made familiar with the Marxian thought, and at the same time with the Marxian spirit. The compromises of the Marxian scheme
The Trend towards Unity

the cases in which Marx was not Marxian. The way to unity should have been reversed; from within, outwardly. First must the agitations in individual lands be divested to some degree of their national and contingent features, first must the general economic development be further advanced, before the proletariat could by internal development become conscious of its international solidarity and come to a recognition of this unity in the chief points of its programme.

This internal and external unification, which is the product of the last decade, I might specify as the third stage in the development of the social movement; and then the second stage would be the complete saturation of the German social democracy with the Marxian spirit. This political party becomes thereby the organ through which those ideas spread into other lands.

In Germany there has grown into recognition a social movement which, at the beginning, was conducted in the spirit of both Marx and Lassalle, but which soon came under the control of pure Marxism. I recall the following stages of development. When thirty-two years ago the deadly bullet struck Lassalle in that man was removed who alone had led the German working-men's move-ment, what he left behind was next to nothing. "Working-Men's Union" numbered four thousand six hundred and ten members at the moment when he closed his operations; and petty strife. It was a coterie of a social party. Thus the field in which the operations of Lassalle's agitation was nothing more than a plaything. This was started in 1864 by Wilhelm Liebknecht, who came to Germany as the disciple of Karl Marx, and with strong ideas; the purpose was to establish transfer was accomplished was drawn by Liebknecht and was inspired by the Marxian spirit. Thus in 1868 a new social party was formed in Germany which took the name of the Social-Democratic Working-Men’s Party, and which, after the congress in Eisenach, stood for a time alone as the so-called “Honorablens,” until in the year 1875 the union of the Lassalle and the Bebel faction was accomplished in Gotha. Since that time, as you know, the one “Social-Democratic Party” exists. It is significant that the present union rests upon a compromise between Lassalle and Marx, but is really directed by the Marxists, who step by step have won control in the party. The “Gotha” programme remained as the platform of the movement in Germany for sixteen years; and not until the year 1891 was it replaced by a new platform, the “Erfurt” programme, which now constitutes the confession of faith of the Social-Democratic movement in Germany. It is pervaded by a strongly Marxian spirit and contains essentially only a statement of Marxian doctrines in accordance with the spirit of the age. Let me in a few words present merely the lines of thought in this programme. It begins with the phrases:
Socialism

The Trend towards Unity

Socialism

omic development of middle-class society necessity of nature to the extinction of that order, production on a small scale, which rests private ownership of the workman in his means on. It separates the workman from his production, and changes him into a possessionarian; while the instruments of production monopoly of a small number of capitalists, etc."

see, this programme proceeds from fundamental thought that economic development completes itself in a specific way; how all the other matters with which programme deals. This special Marxian that an economic evolution is in--as become the central point of the programme. It shows, further, how fare of the working classes to consciousness and unity, to show the natural and necessary goal—that is the duty of the Social-Democratic Party.” This is the point that is especially important for us—the German agitation becomes completely saturated, rapidly and uninterruptedly, with Marxian ideas, and thus this spirit spreads gradually into other lands.
The Trend towards Unity

If you now ask me how this gradual extension of the Marxian system and in connection with it the unification of the Marxian movement are shown, the following points seem to me of especial importance. In 1873 the “International” came to an end. It seemed as if, with it, the internationalisation of the social movement in like manner had ceased. But for about a decade past we have had again general and formal “International Working-Men’s Congresses.” The year 1889 opened the series with a working-men’s congress in Paris, again at a world’s exposition. Here again, in a new and freer form, this idea of the old “International” arises, and in a much larger form than the old international working-men’s associations had ever realised it. For these former international working-men’s associations had been really only a combination
Socialism

ber of representatives and secretaries, in addition to the demands of the working people, the character of which now again the world of working men have created rest upon a much more solid basis, in my opinion, since, in spite of the "illusions" and factional strife, these national meetings represent a real combination of the efforts of working men conscious of their aim and united for it—a fact which we can no longer hide from ourselves, since the old Engtish trade unions have become represented at these congresses. Thus the international conference now include the so-called "socialists" or trade unions as well. In spite of all differences of opinion on certain points, at these congresses there is such expression of agreement and solidarity, and a sense of the thoughts of the Marxian programme. There is first the important fact to remember that the French, originally uneconomic in temperament, have now begun effectively the trade-union agitation. The creation of Bourses du Travail prove how earnestly this part of the social movement is cultivated by the French. Through the agitation of class strife, the general movement towards such associations receives a new impulse. And as the French, inclined to revolutionary and political agitation, begin to become economic, we see on the other side the very important fact that the English working-man recedes step by step from his purely trade-union "Manchester" platform.

The Trend towards Unity

I have never believed what some years ago was announced to the world, in connection with a snap resolution of a working-men's congress, that the English trade-unions would go over to the socialistic camp with torch and trumpet. Such decisive changes in social life are not accomplished in that way; there is needed a slow ripening. And the proceedings of the London congress in this year (1896) prove how much antipathy yet exists between the English trade-unions and certain elements
Socialism

ment socialism. But in spite of all tencies the fact remains that the Enging-men's movement approaches the tal on important points; that is, it has begun to be socialistic in aim and political means used. That an "Independking-Men's Party" as yet plays no rôle and proves for the present nothing.
icular conditions of English party life representation of the working men ment unnecessary under the circum-

But who can doubt, in view of the ings of the last decade, that the Eng-ge-unions, even the older ones, stretch and more than formerly towards the ck of legislation? Let me remind you that with small, though slowly in-
The Trend towards Unity

In Germany we find that the normal line, upon which the social movement in all nations begins to arrange itself, was nearly reached at the start. It was only necessary to throw off some of Lassalle's peculiar ideas, those revolutionary notions which arose here and there about the year 1870, and especially to give broader play to the trade-union movement, in order to reach the "minimum programme" of all social agitation. This programme is, to repeat concisely:—the object of the social movement is the communisation of the means of production in its largest technical development upon a democratic basis; the means of reaching this aim is the struggle of classes; this has two equally justifiable forms, the economic—which finds its expression in the trade-union movement, the political—which finds its expression in representation in Parliament. The formulation of this proposition is the specific service of Karl Marx, as we have seen; and for this reason I think I am warranted in speaking of the whole social movement of our time as infused with the Marxian spirit. For it is not unknown to you that the social agitation in lands of later capitalistic development—Italy, Austria, and Russia—has been from the begin-
Socialism

in accordance with the thought of that way I think that I see a unified the social movement, that does not it I see a machine-like uniformity of ment in the different lands. I am the innumerable diversities which oped by the various nations, and which led every moment. I have attempted do you how absolutely necessary these peculiarities are, and to a certain dey will be—because of historic tradidifference of national character. So speak of a unity, I only mean, as I ready often said, a tendency to this struggles to assert itself in spite of na-positions. The social irritation will you a systematic review of the manifold points of difference which have already often been referred to in the course of these lectures. Thus will be completed the picture of the essentials of the modern social movement, which I am attempting to sketch for you.

The Trend towards Unity

CHAPTER VII

TENDENCIES OF THE PRESENT

"A man refuses to dismiss the fool that he carries within, any great mistake, or to acknowledge any truth that despair."

Goethe, Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship.

... caring at all about what is going on in these days, has not noticed the many positions which are now apparent in the social movement? Even the inexperienced server, or he who stands too near to have free and wide outlook, will
Tendencies of the Present

quarrelsomeness, caprice, malevolence, lack of honour—innumerable traits of character give occasion for friction and contention.

But for these the social theorist cares nothing. Only that is of importance to him which rests upon an essential difference. And of these also there are enough, because the causes of them are numerous. What is here decisive is the variation in the view of world and life, is the difference of national character, is the varying degree of vision into the essence of social development or of understanding concerning accepted principles, is the varying measure of ripeness and education of the masses, is the difference in economic development in the various lands, etc.

But I cannot possibly exhaust the points of contradiction and strife which arise out of these manifold and effective causes. I shall here simply present certain matters which seem to me especially important because essentially significant. My duty as to this problem can be, again, only that of a theorist who tries to make a clear explanation, who desires not to work upon your will but upon your intelligence, who does not carry in his hand the brand of agitation but the lamp of illumination.
Socialism

I do not pay attention to some points of the which may seem to you of supreme importance, it is not because I do not myself attach this importance, but because I suppose that it is a contradiction that comes to expression and to be either out of date or only imagined, because I go back of them to the essential differences. Thus, for example, the alternative, trade unions or a working-class party, is either the expression of a opposition concerning which I shall speak, or it is a question that does not interest us in these days. Thus concerning representatives of the working-men's movement who place themselves upon the plan of legal struggle. These men know be decided separately in each place and case. The economic ripeness of the masses, the degree of political freedom, and much else, must decide.
Tendencies of the Present

In a similar way is another point of difference to be judged; shall there be an independent working-men's party or not? You know, I have already spoken to you a number of times concerning this, saying that in England thus far there has been practically no independent working-men's party; I have given to you the reasons why, as it seems to me, any such party has been until now at least unnecessary, even if the working men desired to busy themselves in political matters. The political influence of the social movement is not dependent upon the existence of an independent party of working men. Even that question is not a general one; it must be decided according to local circumstances.

If we ask now for antitheses of real importance, we are met first and especially, to-day, by that sufficiently explained opposition which is contained in the words revolution or evolution, the old point of discussion which was, is, and I believe will be, a constant feature of social agitation; that point of separation which
Socialism

...ed first in the "International," and to-day we see revived in the opposition to-called "Junger" and the anarchists the majority of organised labour. The reason account of which I think that also future this discussion will not cease are reasons. Revolutionism is, as I have shown a manifestation of unripeness. A man in a certain sense, assert that the social movement begins anew every moment; for every new masses arise out of the lower the proletariat yet living in stupid slumberousness, and they attach themselves social movement. These unschooled...
Tendencies of the Present

The development of social agitation plays their part at the same time in different spheres of the proletariat. So far as can be seen, there has been thus far an uninterrupted progress in the absorption of the unripe revolutionary elements by the evolutionists.

But even here, where the idea of evolution, consciously or unconsciously, obtains recognition as the basis of the social movement, we meet questions, many of which, as it seems to me, arise because of a false conception of the essence of social evolution.

Although I have had opportunity at different times to show what social evolution is, at least in a general way, let me here repeat concisely what I understand by this idea; for a right comprehension of this point is all-important. Social evolution, and the conception of the social movement as such an evolution, rest upon the thought that we find ourselves in a continued condition of economic and thus social change, and that specific social interests and the necessary relations of mastery are connected with each change; thus in proportion as the evolution proceeds and as the activities of the interested groups develop, the balance of power displaced, with the result that the rules are slowly replaced by other classes in control. Here also lies at bottom the thought that the division of power at any time is truly the expression of economic power, and is no merely accidental and artificer; that this power can only be dissolved gradually, and only as the economic relations are changed, and as at the same time personal and subjective conditions and the characteristics of the aspiring classes are developed.
Socialism

In a word, social evolution is a continuous achievement of power, the creation of the condition of society, corresponding to the natural and schooling of character.
the fact that all the occurrences in social life are carried out by living men, and that men complete the process of development by placing aims before themselves and by striving to realise these aims.

The standpoints of the social theorist and of him who deals practically in social life are entirely different; but men constantly interchange the two. For the theorist, social development is a necessary sequence of cause and effect, as he sees it in the shaping of life compulsorily by the motives of the persons involved; and these motives themselves he tries to understand in their limitations. For him social life is a process rather of the past. But for the man who deals practically in social life, it lies in the future. What the theorist understands as the working of specified causes is, to the practical man, an object lying in the future which his will should help to accomplish. This very will is a necessary element in the causation of social happening. And this will, conditioned as it may be, is the highest personal possession of man in action. As the social theorist seeks to show as necessary specific tendencies of the will, and with them specific developments of the social life, he can do this self-evident limitation that the energy of practical man in creating and accomplishing these efforts of the will does not fail. By reason, for example through the influence of quietistic sentiment, this energy is lessened, the most important link in the chain of causes would drop out, and development would take an entirely different course. It is a great mistake to apply the idea of a qualified social life the idea of a nature in accordance with natural law; for it is to say that socialism must come by a process of nature.” Socialism has nothing to do with anything such necessity. Thus, for example, one cannot see why the development of science should not lead just as well to the recognition of the social institution.
Socialism

we have just spoken stands another matter, which also in the last analysis depends upon a right understanding of the essence of social evolution. I refer to the confusion of "ideal" and "programme"—the substitution of politics for idealism. I mean this: superficial evolutionists, especially in the ranks of the Marxists, are inclined to look with supreme contempt upon idealists and enthusiasts, and to rest only upon practical politics; they emphasise the rational to the exclusion of the ideal. That is a conception which does not at all harmonise with the real meaning of evolution. For evolution wants its highest social ideals to be realised, but these are founded only upon postulates essentially ethical. To realise these ideals it is necessary to become inspired, to kindle a heart's glow, to develop a fire of enthusiasm. The warming sun must shed its beams, if all is not to go under and become darkened—with danger of the annihilation of all life. The word of the dying St. Simon, with which he took departure from his favourite scholar Rodriguez, is eternally true: "Never forget, my friend, that a man must have enthusiasm in order to accomplish great things." When this idealism and enthusiasm disappear movement, when its impetus is lost, passes into a littleness of opportunism, emptiness of small politics, it dies like without life. And it is certainly one of the most unpleasant traits of many of the representatives of the proletarian movement in the dusty atmosphere of common life that they have lost their enthusiasm and dropped down to the level of political malcontents.
Socialism

On the other side, we must not confuse enthusiasm with fantasy or utopism. Enthusiasm for a social object should be combined with common sense. In the one is warmth, in the other coldness; in the one lies the ideal, in the other the real; in the one the path to the end, in the other the end itself.
and necessity of gradual reform is only awakened as a deeper insight into the worth and essence of the ideal is obtained.

It must be allowed that a certain contradiction will remain in any full understanding of the evolution idea in a social movement. We cannot avoid the fact that the sceptical pessimist stands by the side of the light-hearted optimist; that there will always be some who hope for a speedy entrance into the promised land, while others are of the opinion that the march thereto lies through the wilderness and will last long. Hence the differences of position that men take regarding what we call practical reforms. Men who believe that we are about to move into a new building will not be willing to try to improve the old structure; but those who think that the new edifice may be long in rising will be contented to live for a while longer as comfortably as possible in the old structure. This contradiction is in the nature of man. It will continue ineradicable. It is enough for a man to be conscious of its existence.

What we have learned to recognise thus far of antithesis rests upon essentially different conceptions of the essence of social develop-
Socialism

or upon different interpretations of one conception—the evolutionary. Let us, in a few words, speak of a matter that rests upon the different interpretations that when they arise to consciousness—men place upon the progress and the law of social development. This contradiction rests upon a variation of ideal, and gently of programme; and it may be deduced in the antithesis democratic or so-

In order to understand properly the most important contradiction, which stands as the central point of discussion, which finds its acutest expression in the agrarian question, I must remind something said heretofore—at that time, I understood it to mean the
Tendencies of the Present

of its economic conditions of existence, how will the proletariat conduct itself with all those strata of society who have not this same basis of economic existence? What will be the relation of the proletariat to those masses who are not yet made proletarian in character—as, for example, the lower middle-classes? And there is a question yet more important—What will be the relation of the proletariat to that part of the people, the demos, who cannot possibly ever have a tendency towards becoming proletarian? Here arises the great dilemma, and this is the deep contradiction which comes here to expression: Shall the aim of the proletariat remain essentially and preponderantly proletarian, or shall it become on the whole democratic? And further, if the working-men's party will interest itself in all these component parts of the demos, how shall the proletariat conduct itself with them? If there is to be a general democratic "people's party," what then becomes of the proletarian programme? For this is clear: the whole reason for the existence of socialistic agitation, as it is to-day attempted, with the cry of a "need of nature" in the economic development, falls to the ground in the moment when this economic development does
Socialism

...to the proletarianisation of the masses...
Tendencies of the Present

always been only change to a higher system of economy, and that those classes thrive who represent this higher system. Behind capitalism there is no “development”; possibly there may be ahead. The degree of production which has been reached by it must in any case be rivalled by any party that will secure the future for itself. In that is shown, I think, the standard of any advance movement.

If the social democracy is to maintain its historic mission, if it is to be a party of advance, it must avoid compromise with the notoriously declining classes, as the hand-workers and other economically low organisations. Even a temporary compact with them is dangerous. It will not be admissible, also, to change the programme and goal of the social movement to suit the middle-class elements that have crept in, if that great aim of production upon the largest scale shall be held fast—because we know positively that their hand-work represents in general a low form of economy. But now the other side of the question. If there are spheres in economic life which are not to be subjected to this process of communisation, because the smaller method of business is under the conditions more profit-
Socialism

Do the larger,—how about the farmer? The whole problem which to-day stands social democracy as the "agrarian" Must the communistic ideal of on a large scale, and the developed me connected with it, undergo any change as applied to the peasantry?
A man reaches the conclusion that in development no tendency to pro-on a large scale exists, but that here on a large scale is not at all the form of management, then we see the decisive question—Shall we now ocratic in the sense of allowing pro-on a small scale in this sphere and range our programme and desert the
Tendencies of the Present

fully because thus far, so far as I know, there is no certainty either as to the tendency of development among the agriculturalists or as to the form of management, nor are we certain as to whether any specific form of agrarian production is the superior. But, so far as I see, the Marxian system breaks down on this point; the deductions of Marx are not applicable to the sphere of agriculture without change. He has said much of importance concerning agrarian matters; but his theory of development, which rests upon an assumption of business upon a large scale and upon the proletarianising of the masses, and which necessarily leads to socialism in its development, is only for the sphere of manufactures. It does not apply to agricultural development; and to me it seems that only a scientific investigation will be able to fill the gap which now exists.

Of far-reaching importance, and at this moment of pressing interest, are two points which I would present in conclusion. I mean the attitude of the social movement towards religion and towards nationality. Because here personal feeling and temperament may easily interfere with the clear vision of the observer, it is doubly necessary to divest oneself of all and to deal with these problems object-Let us make the attempt. Leaving out eration the English working-man, who has a generation ago, seems to oscillate pietism and positivism, and who on ight cannot be considered typical because well-known peculiar conditions of his ment, the proletarian movement double-strongly anti-religious. How comes this?
Socialism

far as I see, the opposition to religion from two different sources: it has a tical" and a "practical" origin. Theo-the proletariat and its leaders have heirs of the liberal "age of illumina-Out of a superficial study of natural have sprung all these anti-religious of the use" of 19th century science.
excludes religion. Thus the attitude of the proletariat towards religion would be entirely free and independent if the ground of its irreligion were merely a theoretic and misleading incursion into the dogmatism of natural science. But the enmity to religion has much deeper grounds. Not only has an enthusiasm for scientific materialism taken hold of the proletariat with special force; but also the enthusiasm for unbelief has been helped greatly in its development by the instinctive feeling, or the clear consciousness, that in the materialistic conception of the world lies the germ of a mighty revolutionary force, well suited to drive authority from all spheres of life. What wonder that the proletariat took hold of it as a useful weapon for the strife; for, as we know, one of the conditions of the very existence of the proletariat lies in a tearing asunder of all the old points of faith. Thus the predilection for materialism and atheism is well explained.

And now consider that the acceptance of this dogma betokens a protest against the Christian system of thought, which the working man must look upon as inimical because represented by the ruling classes and used in their interests. For there can be no doubt an overwhelming majority of cases, Christianity has been used by the classes against the movement for the liberation of the proletariat. The fate of the Christian is upon heretical Christians is the best thing. So long as men try to support democracy and capitalism as a necessary and inevitable institution, using the Christian Church as a purpose, the social movement must remain anti-ecclesiastical and thus anti-religious.
Socialism

Thus a mistrust as to the position, influence, and social struggle, of the official representatives of the Church estranges the professional from this Church and thus from the large public. In the moment that this mistrust is spread— and you all know that the new socialist, especially in Germany, how adaptability, I do not dare to say. But that it is thus adapted would seem to be indicated by the fact that it became the religion of Rome in its decadence and of the German tribes in the youthful freshness of their civilisation, of feudalism as well as of those stages of civilisation in which the free cities and later the bourgeoisie have had predominance. Then why may it not also be the religion of the proletariat? But it must be presented to the lower classes with all of the joy of life of which Christianity is capable. For the element of asceticism in Christianity pleases little these classes, which press towards air and light and which do not show any inclination to allow the good things of life to be taken from them.

As if overhung with thick clouds of passion, appears now the question as to the attitude of the social movement towards nationality. A great part of the heated discussion on this point, as it seems to me, is due to lack of clearness in thought. It is not so much our German language, as it is our German instinct, that distinguishes between two ideas, rightly but not always sharply separated; we are accustomed to specify them as patriotism and nationalism.
Socialism

Socialism, the love of the Fatherland, is in-sealing that unconsciously and without being held fast in our hearts, and exists a little love of home and of family. It is an accumulation of impressions, of memories, over which we have no control. It is that indefin-er exercised upon our souls by the the mother tongue, by the harmony and the national song, by many peculiar customs and ceremonies, by the whole history and poetry and song, by the whole history and poetry of the home land. It is that feeling which its fulness only in a strange land, and is truly upon the soul of the exiled man as upon that of the peaceful citi-cannot see why this should be the of a particular class. It is a foolish
Tendencies of the Present

observed before in connection with the attitude of the proletariat towards religion; they identify the idea of "nationalism" with the ruling classes, and as enemies of the representatives of the idea they turn their hatred against the idea itself. Especially is this so because, in many lands, it is not made easy for the rising working-men's movement to identify itself with the official representatives of the nation; hate, persecution, repression, are not suitable means to arouse pride in that national structure in which the working men must live together with those from whom all this evil proceeds. At the same time a friendly hand is reached over the national boundary-line by the proletariat of a strange and unfriendly land, by companions in suffering, with similar interests and efforts. Truly it is no wonder that the modern proletariat generally becomes imbued with an anti-national, an international, tendency.

But I hold it to be quite wrong to justify an anti-national theory by this impulsive anti-nationalism. I see in the essence of modern socialism no reason for such an idea. I have explicitly pointed out to you the tendency towards an international understanding and unity on the part of the proletariat. But that
Socialism

An artificial abolition of national barrides one who chases after the phantom d republic will be able to imagine a development outside of national limitations; a man will hardly venture to prophesy certainty, even for only a short time, when the social contradictions within a small rival those points of difference not existing between nations. But it is clear even to the short-sighted that, we can see, an energetic upholding of national interests can never be entirely necessary.

Of in Western Europe the differences nations should be so far obviated that national questions remain in the field, I Tendencies of the Present

attempt of China to enter civilisation in order to nibble at the fruits of commerce and to grow out of its narrow circle—this development will doubtless take a course which must of necessity lead to new international complications. I believe that the moment will come when European society as a whole will say to itself: All our mutual differences are of no importance as compared with that which threatens us from this enemy. As an indication of this see the attitude of America towards Asiatic development. There is a case in which the "internationalism" of the proletariat is simply thrown aside; and this would be the case also among the proletariat of Western Europe, if the coolies should begin to swarm over us like rats. An artificial sympathy with the most downtrodden people would prove too weak to restrain a sound national self-interest. So soon as a common enemy threatens the existence of a society it becomes again conscious of its economic interests and rallies to their support; and in the meantime its internal differences are forgotten.

Thus there can be no talk of an essential repudiation of nationalism on the part of the
Socialism

that throughout the world. Discussion question concerns only a circle of nations to which one does not want the principle of anti-nationalism applied. Each national groups are constituted is on which it is not necessary for us determine, as I desire only to present intial point in the national problem. that, with this discussion, I com-circle of my thought, and return to which I began—the idea that there apparently always will be, an anti-bound which, as around poles, human circles, the social and the national. something which the proletariat should get.
CHAPTER VIII

LESSONS

"Πόλεμος πατηρ πάντων."

War is the father of all things.

CAN we draw lessons from this historical review of the social movement? I think we can, on many points; to show you what these lessons are will be my effort in this last lecture. Perhaps I may exert some influence upon the judgment of those who personally stand outside of the present social strife and desire to be merely passionless observers. And I shall be glad if, here and there among those actively engaged in the struggle, some shall be found who will recognise the justice of what I may say.

It seems to me that the first impression to be made upon anyone by quiet observation of the social movement must be that it is necessary and unavoidable. As a mountain torrent, after a thunder-storm, must dash down into the valley according to "iron, unchangeable must the stream of social agitation itself onward. This is the first thing for us to understand, that something of great and importance is developing before our eyes. We have accomplished in connection with this point we are in the midst of a great pro-world history which with elementary forces hold of individuals and even na-and concerning which it is as wrong to den-struggle against it.” (Lorenz von Prochaska)

169
Socialism

Probably there are some who believe social movement is merely the mal-work of a few agitators, or that the democracy has been “brought up by
—that the modern social movement, at least in its main features, exists necessarily as it is. Among these main features I include the object that it sets before itself, the socialistic ideal; also the means which it chooses for the accomplishment of this ideal,—class strife. I have already attempted to show you why these points must be allowed as the necessary result of existing conditions.

Now shall we who do not stand in the ranks of those who struggle for the new social order, shall we who only tremble for the permanence of that which seems to us necessary for the upholding of our civilisation—shall we be greatly pained and troubled at the present condition of things as thus shown?

I think it hardly necessary to excite ourselves over the "dangers" of any socialistic order of society in the future. We who know that all social order is only the expression of specific economic relations can face what comes with indifference; so long as these arrangements of economic life are not given up, especially so long as the character of the persons involved is not completely changed, no power on earth, no party—be it ever so revolutionary—can succeed in establishing a new order for humanity. And if these conditions are at any time fulfilled—then will be the time to look further.
Socialism

It is not this socialistic ideal of the world that principally causes anxiety to so many. It is rather the form in which the ideal is striven for; it is that word of wisdom uttered by Philistines both male and female.

I must acknowledge that for me this idea of the socialistic ideal is nothing at all terrible, rather the contrary. Is it really true that, even if strife and struggle are to go on throughout society, man must give up all hope of a further and successful development of humanity? Is it really true that culture, all the noblest acquirements of mankind, are endangered by that strife?
of much that is desirable. I think that the old proverb is true as applied even to social strife, "Πόλεμος πατήρ πάντων." It is only through struggle that the most beautiful flowers of human existence bloom. It is only struggle that raises the great masses of the common people to a higher level of humanity. Whatever of culture is now forced upon the masses comes to them through struggle; the only warrant for the hope that they can be developed into new and higher forms of culture lies in the fact that they must rise through their efforts, that step by step they must fight for their rights. It is struggle alone that builds character and arouses enthusiasm, for nations as for classes. Let me remind you of a beautiful saying of Kant's, that expresses the same thought: "Thanks to nature for intolerance, for envious and emulous self-seeking, for the insatiable desire to have and to rule! Without this, all the desirable qualities of humanity would lie eternally undeveloped. Man wants peace, but Nature knows better what is necessary for him; she wants strife."

And why lose courage, as we see that even in social life struggle is the solution? To me this seems no reason for despair. I rejoice in
Socialism

of the history of the world; that is view of life which makes struggle as inal point of existence.
we should never forget that as conflict developer of what is good, so it may also disturber and destroyer of all civilisation: it does not lead only and by necessity ter life, it is not necessarily the beginning of a new culture: it can also betoken the end of the old, and of all, human existence.

This reason I think that we should never count of two great ideas in this strife.
All social struggle should be determin-in legal bounds. Thus only can the of the idea of right remain uninjured.
It this we plunge into chaos. Man relies on the law of right to protect Lessons

This exhortation addresses itself in like manner to both parties in the struggle; to those who are now in power, not less than to those who are carrying on the social agitation. Intra muros peccatur et extra! There is sin within, as without, the walls.

The same is true of a second demand, which must be developed in the name of culture and humanity within these struggling parties, if the social strife is not to be a war of extermination. It must be carried on with proper weapons, not with poisoned arrows. How greatly have both sides been to blame in this respect! How difficult it is to keep out of the battle on the one side bitterness, mendacity, malice; on the other side brutality, derision, violence! How readily does the one opponent charge dishonour or bad motive against the other! How repellent, how offensive, too often, is the tone in which opinion is expressed! Must that be? Is that necessary for energetic assertion of one's standpoint? Does a man think that he loses anything by conceding that his opponent is an honourable man and by assuming that truth and honour will control in the dealings of his adversary? I do not think so. The man who places him-
Socialism

...
be an opponent. Then will it be easy, I think, to respect the other man, to refrain from suspicion and contempt, to battle with him openly and honourably. Shall we extol the Geneva Convention, which humanised warfare, as a fruit of advanced culture; and yet within our kingdom, like barbarians, without any consideration for the opponent, fly one upon another with dishonourable weapons?

In this the development of English social agitation can serve as a model. It points out to us how men may conduct in social life a moral and civilised warfare. Even upon the Continent, I hope, will the more humane form of struggle reach acceptance, if only because it springs of necessity from a deeper conception of what class strife really is. So long as the battle rages legally and honourably, we need not worry about the future of our civilisation.

Schiller's lines show how undisturbed we may be at the social struggle:

``A full life is what I want,
And swinging and swaying, to and fro,
Upon the rising and falling waves of fortune.
For a man becomes stunted in quietness of life;
Idleness and rest are the grave of energy.

But war develops strength,
It raises all to a level above what is ordinary,
It even gives courage to the cowardly.`` international activity of the working-men's movement. In addition, the ment of capitalism and of social legislation, so far as they have relation of re indicated in heavy type.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>FRANCE</th>
<th>GERMANY</th>
<th>INTERNATIONAL</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
reintroduce the Elizabethan trade ordinances. Laws for the protection of machines.

1776 Adam Smith (1723–90). "Wealth of Nations."

1796 Baboef's conspiracy, or "The Equals."

1830-1832

The movement of Bazard and Enfantin, the disciples of Saint Simon.

1831

Insurrection of the silk workers in Lyons: "Vivre en travaillant ou mourir en combattant."

1833

Beginnings of specific legislation for working-men.

1834

Grand national consolidated trade union, in the spirit of Robert Owen.

1836

Beginning of the "Journalistic" period of Fourierism under Victor Considerant. Appearance of the Christian socialists (De La Mennais); the "Icarian Communism" of Cabot (Voyage en Icarie, 1840).

1840

The "Junger Deutschland" in Switzerland. "Bund der Gerechten"; with its central office in London after 1840.
development of historic-commu-clubbism and cracy in "Société te egalite\- 1844 The Pioneers of Rochdale.

P. J. Proudhon (1809–1865). "Qu'est-ce que la propriété?"

1847

Loom riots in Langenhienau u. Peterwaldau; tumults of working-men in Breslau, Warmbrunn, and other places.

The "Bund der Gerechten" changes itself into the "Bund der Kommunisten" and takes as its platform the "Communist Manifesto," written by Karl Marx (1818–1883) and Frederick Engels (1820–1895). "Proletarians of all lands, unite yourselves."

1848

The Paris "February Revolution."

Proletarian representatives in the provisional government; Louis Blanc and Albert. 23 u. 24. VI., "June insurrection." The proletariat defeated in street fights.

Communist agitation on the Rhine, started by Karl Marx and associates. ("Neue Rheinische Zeitung," i. VI. 48–19. V. 49). The German working-men's movement captured by the hand-workers. Ste-
Stern regulations of the various German governments and of the Confederation for the complete repression of the working-men's movement.

Gradual founding of working-men's associations and "culture unions" (Schulze-Delitzsch).
1851 Founding of the United Society of Machinists.

1852

1862

1863

Deputation of working-men from Leipzig to the leaders of the national union in Berlin: "Honorary members!"

Ferdinand Lassalle (1825-1864; 1858, "Herkunft, der Dunkle"; 1864, "System der erworbenen Rechte"); i. III.: "Offenes Antwortschreiben an das Central Komitee zur Berufung eines allgemeinen deutschen Arbeiter-Kongresses zu Leipzig."

23. V.: Founding of the general German working-men's movement by Lassalle. Disruption after Lassalle's death in the male line (Becker, J. B. von Schweitzer)

First World's Exposition in London.

The "League of Communists" dissolves.
Founding of the International Working-Men's Association by the delegates of different nations at the World's Exposition in London. Inaugural address and a constitution by Karl Marx. He remains the veiled leader of the "International." The general office of the Society is in London.

Beginnings of trade agitation; the tobacco workers; (1866 the printers).

Bismarck forces the general, equal, secret, and direct ballot.

Appearance of the first volume of "Capital" by Karl Marx.

Founding of the "Alliance International de 1869

Liberal trade regulation for the German Empire. Rapid development of capitalism, especially after the war.

The founding of the "Social-Democratic Working-men's Party" at the Congress at Eisenach: the so-called "Ehlichen." August Bebel (born 1840); Wilhelm Liebknecht (born 1826).

Founding of the "Hirsch-Duncker" trade unions.

The General Assembly of the German Catholic unions decides upon participation in the social movement from the Catholic standpoint.

La démocratie sociale" by Michael Bakunin (1814-1876), with anarchistic tendencies in clear opposition to the Marxist ideas.
Fusion of the followers of Lassalle with the Eisenachers at the congress in Gotha. The "compromise platform" of Gotha.

Congress of the "I. A. A." at Hague. Exclusion of Bakunin and his faction, who yet for a time find a standing-place in the "Fédération jurassienne." Removal of the general office of the "I. A. A." to New York.

The "I. A. A." formally dissolves.
1877

1879–1890

1878

1879

The Ghent "World's Congress." Attempt for the reconciliation of the Bakunists and the Marxists miscarries. A general union of International Socialism is resolved upon by the Marxists, but does not come to importance.

Law concerning the socialists. Destruction of working-men's organizations. Removal of the strength of the agitation to other lands. ("Social-demokrat" in Zurich and London.)

Founding of a conservative Christian Socialism by Stöcker.

Working-Men's Congress in Marseilles for the first time gives power to the Collectivists.
the moderates and radicals. The latter constitute themselves "Parti ouvrier révolutionnaire socialiste."

The Men's Congress of Étienne. Division of the Possibilists or "Guesdists," former split, at a time, into "Brons-" ("Fédération des voulants socialistes de France"), Marxists, and Communists ("Parti socialiste révolutionnaire français").
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Event</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1883</td>
<td>Founding of the Fabian Society.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1884</td>
<td>Beginning of governmental working-man's assurance; Insurance for the sick; 1884, Insurance against accident; 1890, Insurance for the sick and aged.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1885</td>
<td>A new &quot;Syndicate&quot; law favors the development of the trade-union movement.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1886</td>
<td>Founding of the &quot;Société d'économie sociale&quot; by Benoit Malon, the center of the &quot;independent&quot; socialists (&quot;Parti socialiste indépendant&quot;).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1887</td>
<td>Beginning of the &quot;new Unionism&quot;; the trade-union movement reaches lower strata of the working men with socialistic tendencies (John Burns,</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Two International Congresses of Working-men at Paris constituted by the "Possibilists" and the "Guesdistes" proclaim as the salvation of the proletariat in general the legal enactment of an eight-hour day of work, and the celebration of May 1st as the working-men's holiday. (The first International Association Congress under the new enumeration.)

The first May festival of the proletariat in all civilized lands.

The first International Miners' Congress at Jolimont.
1890

A new party programme for the Social-Democracy founded definitely upon Marxist principles; the so-called "Erfurt programme." Separation of the "independent" socialists of anarchistic tendency from the Social-Democracy.

1891

1892

Congress of socialists at Marseilles resolves upon an agrarian programme with recognition of small peasantry holdings.

First general trade-union Congress at Halberstadt.

1893

First Congress of the "Fédération de Bourses du Travail."

The Social-Democracy comes out of the parliamentary elections as the strongest party in Ger-

Third International Working-Men's Congress in Zurich; the English trade-unions many with 4,730,750 votes.

Beginning of a Democratic-Christian-Social agitation by Pastor Nau mann (Die Hilfe).

Democratic unity in union with the continental socialists.

First International Weavers' Congress at Manchester.

Fourth International Working-Men's Congress in London.
INDEX

"Agrarian question," The .............................................................. 158
Agricultural development, The Marxian theory of development not applicable to ................................................................. 159
Alliance Internationale de la Démocratie Sociale, The ............... 128
Anarchism, French .................................................................. 79
Anti-capitalistic literature .......................................................... 23
Anti-ecclesiastical nature of the proletarian movement ............ 162
Anti-national tendency of the proletariat .................................. 165
Anti-religious nature of the proletarian movement ................... 162
Asiatic development .................................................................. 166 Assurance, Beginning of the German governmental workingmen's ........................................................................... 191
Attitude of America towards Asiatic development .................... 167
Babeuf, The insurrection of ....................................................... 46
Bakunin, Work in Spain and Italy of ......................................... 79
Ballot, Rismark's general, equal, secret, and direct ................... 186
Bebel, August ........................................................................... 132
Bourgeoisie, The ..................................................................... 74
Capitalism, Rapid development in Germany of ....................... 187
Capitalistic methods of production ........................................... 24
 Carlyle, Thomas .................................................................... 22
Characterisation of the social movement ................................... 5
Chartist movement, The .......................................................... 50
Christian socialism ................................................................... 22
Class interest, Creation of ....................................................... 108
Class strife, Various forms of ................................................... 172
Class struggle .......................................................................... 1 Clubbism .................................................................................. 73 Coalition law, More liberal ....................................................... 180

195
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Index</th>
<th>PAGE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Law, The</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>on, Rigorous prohibition of</td>
<td>179</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manifesto of Marx and Engels</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>under which the working class lives</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of 1793, The</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hume</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>work-day, Endorsement by the Liverpool Trade-Congress of an</td>
<td>192</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>trade law</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>trade restriction, Complete removal of</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Struggle of Classes in France</td>
<td>119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Industrial monopoly, 1850–1880</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social development</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social peace</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of working-men's movement</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Characterisation of working-men's movement</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The temperament of working-men, The</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>programme, The</td>
<td>134</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>elements in every social movement</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Index

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Insurance for the sick, against accident, for the aged, in Germany</td>
<td>191</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>International combination, First attempt for</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Internationalism</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;International,&quot; The</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>International Working-Men's Congress in London, Fourth</td>
<td>194</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>International Working-Men's Congress in Zurich, Third</td>
<td>193</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>International Working-Men's Protection Conference in Berlin</td>
<td>193</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inventions of modern machinery</td>
<td>178</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Japanese, The</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kant</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kingsley</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kurd, The</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lamennais</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lassalle, Ferdinand</td>
<td>81</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lassalle movement, The</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legislation for working men, Beginning of specific</td>
<td>181</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legislation in favour of the working man, Value of</td>
<td>181</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leroux, Pierre</td>
<td>22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liebknecht, Wilhelm</td>
<td>132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lot marxiste, The</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lyons, Insurrection of the silk weavers in</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;Machine Riots&quot;</td>
<td>178</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Machines and manufactories, Petitions against</td>
<td>178</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Machines, Laws for the protection of</td>
<td>178</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manchester-Liverpool Railroad, Opening of the</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manufactures, Marxian theory of development applies only to</td>
<td>159</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>the sphere of</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marat</td>
<td>43</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marxian system, Extension of the</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marxian theory of social agitation</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marxism, a social-political realism</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marx, Karl</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Men of Montaigne, The</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Middle-class movements</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot;Minimum programme&quot; of all social agitation, The</td>
<td>139</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muller, Adam</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nationalism</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Index

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Item</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Art, Chief writings of</td>
<td>179</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Institution of Rowland Hill's</td>
<td>164</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Socialism</td>
<td>182</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Seduction of the old English trade-union</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>agitation, The first</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>movement, Anti-ecclesiastical nature of the</td>
<td>162</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>movement, Anti-religious nature of the</td>
<td>160</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ideal and material emancipation of the</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>relation of the, to the * demos*</td>
<td>155</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>* (Irish) tenants</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>error, The significance of the</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>fury passions in the modern proletariat, The ground of</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>* Socialism*</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>human, a manifestation of unripeness</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Test, English working-men contrasted with Roman</td>
<td>76</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of 1848, The proletarian-socialistic character of the</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>David</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social literature, Old and new</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social movement of the masses, Beginnings of the</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social movement, Characterisation of the</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social movement, Contradictions apparent in the</td>
<td>142</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social movement, Meaning of the</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social movement, The political influence of the</td>
<td>145</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social struggle, Legal bounds of</td>
<td>174</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social struggle, Proper weapons of</td>
<td>175</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>St. Simon</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>St. Simon, Chief work of</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Telegraph applied to English railroads, The</td>
<td>182</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Time environment of the modern social movement</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tories and Whigs, Alternation of power between</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trade regulation for the German Empire, Liberal</td>
<td>187</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trade-union act (English) supplemented in 1875</td>
<td>188</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unification of the proletariat, Internal and external</td>
<td>131</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Utopian socialists</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Value, Marx’s theory of</td>
<td>99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Variations of the social movement</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>von Haller, Leopold</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Working class, Condition of life of the</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Working-men’s assurance, Beginning of the German government</td>
<td>191</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Working-men’s movement, German governmental regulations for the repression of the</td>
<td>184</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Working-Men’s Union,” The</td>
<td>132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>World’s Exposition in London, Fourth</td>
<td>185</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zollverein, Founding of the German</td>
<td>181</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Sociology.

Social Facts and Forces.
"The book is full of invigorating thought, and is to be recommended to everyone who feels the growing importance of public duties."—The Outlook.

Socialism and the Social Movement in the Nineteenth Century.
By WERNER SOMBART, University of Breslau, Germany.
Translated by ANSON P. ATTERBURY. With Introduction by JOHN B. CLARK, Professor of Political Economy in Columbia University. 12°, $1
"Sombart's treatise on socialism impresses me as admirable; and the translation is certainly an excellent piece of work."—J. B. CLARK, Professor of Political Economy in Columbia University.

The Sphere of the State, or, The People as a Body Politic. By FRANK S. HOFFMAN, A.M., Professor of Philosophy, Union College.
Second edition. 12°, $1.50.
"Professor Hoffman has done an excellent piece of work. He has furnished the student with a capital text-book and the general reader, who is interested in political science, with much that is suggestive, much that is worthy of his careful attention."

Anarchism.
A Criticism and History of the Anarchist Theory. By E. V. ZENKER. 12°, $1.50.
"The fullest and best account of anarchism ever published. . . . A most powerful and trenchant criticism."—London Book Cazette.

Economics.

Hadley's Economics.

Account of the Relations between Private Property and Public Welfare. By ARTHUR TWINING HADLEY, Professor of Political Economy, in Yale University. 8°, $2.50 net.

This book is now used in classes in Yale, Princeton, Harvard, Amherst, Dartmouth, Vanderbilt, Bucknell, Bates, Leland Stanford, University of California, etc.

The author has done his work splendidly. He is clear, precise, and convincing. No other book has given an equally compact and intelligent statement of the facts. —American Journal of Sociology.

The Bargain Theory of Wages.

DAVIDSON, M.A., D.PHIL. (Edin.), Professor of Political Economy in the University of New Brunswick. 12mo, $1.50.

Development from the historic theories, together with an examination of the wage factors: the mobility of labor, trade unionism, and industrial remuneration.

Sociology.

By JOHN BASCOM, author of "Esthetics," "Comparative Psychology," etc. 12°, $1.50.

Wholesome and inspiring word on all the living social questions of the age, and showing how the social life of men may be made more wholesome and inspiring.